A LACE COAT IN RENNAISSANCE PATTERN.

This superb coat may be worn over a skirt of dark velvet, or over a frock of sheer white voile or marquisette—a combination favored by authoritative dressmakers for midsummer garden parties and the like. The coat as shown in this instance over a dark velvet skirt, and a white hat, faced with black, and trimmed with sweeping white plumes, completes a dashing "magnificent" effect. At the side of the coat is pinned a cluster of deep purple violets centered by a dead white gardenia—a fashionable corsage decoration this winter.

A WIDE RANGE OF ENDEAVOR OPEN TO THE BLIND

STATISTICS tell us there are nearly 10,000 blind persons in the United States. Many of these are subjects of charity, while others are living with relatives who are able to keep them.

Quite a large number are self-sustaining and a few are laying away money from their earnings. It is interesting to note the great variety of vocations followed by the blind.

Many are musicians and in a number of instances expert instructors are found among them. Many are piano tuners and repairers, and several have become so expert as to command large fees in tuning and repairing large church organs.

The institutions for the education of the blind teach the blind pupils the mechanical, as well as the manual part of all instruments and owing to the acuteness of the sense of hearing in the blind, it is said they make by far the best tuners.

Other trades are taught, such as broom-making, brush manufacturing, caning of chairs, basket weaving, cutting and a variety of hand work. Many of the schools the girls are taught to sew, and it is surprising what fine work some of them are able to do. Sewing machines are used as readily as by those with perfect sight. Almost all blind girls thread their needles through the eyes of the needle with the tongue, being taught in several of the blind schools, and new encouraging work is reported. In several instances the very best of bread and cakes have been produced by totally blind persons.

Several instances are reported in which blind persons have become expert accountants and are employed in making salaries.

Typewriting has been taught for several years but it is only recently that it has been found possible to teach shorthand by the use of a machine similar to a typewriter, equipped with characters composed of a system of points, such as that used in the shorthand point print, with which most blind persons are familiar. It is said that many blind persons are expert with such machines, and are able to hold paying positions. They are less liable to make errors when they become fully versed in the workings of the shorthand typewriter or more correctly speaking, the point printer.

Another new employment for the blind is operating telephone exchanges. Several young women are employed in this capacity in New York, Philadelphia and Chicago, and it will not be long before others will be heard from. The telephone switchboards in several large establishments are controlled by girls, who seldom make a mistake. The keyboard is so arranged as to be operated through the sense of touch.

There are many very successful blind milliners and teachers in missions. Several blind men have mastered the law, in most instances they are able attorneys, and in a few cases have been chosen as judges. Many blind men have been chosen to sit in state legislatures and one or two have been sent to Congress.

Others have gained reputation as lecturers, and a large number have made highly remunerative business.

Many blind men conduct brown factories and some have become quite expert in making baskets, tubes and bars.

Not a few of the blind live in the country and are engaged in farming, fruit and vegetable growing. Another industry in which they are engaged is poultry raising.

It is said by eminent physicians that many blind persons are adapted for giving massage and other treatment, owing to the acuteness of their touch, and the large amount of electricity and personal magnetism possessed by those deprived of sight.

Taking the country as a whole, there are several hundred merchants of considerable wealth, and many more who are engaged in keeping small stores.

Several blind persons are expert electricians and in spite of the danger, no fatalities have been reported.

The blind are great lovers of birds and flowers, and it is astonishing degrees of success attained by some who are florists.

The writer is greatly interested in the blind and has lately received through the sense of touch, a handsome seven-tonerium bird scale, designed for the purpose, one of the greatest of the insect-destrorying birds.

Blind persons contribute much matter to the magazines and newspapers, and in a few instances they have become regular contributors to leading publications.

In many schools for the blind large gymnasiums are provided, and some of the boys and girls become quite expert in the use of the athletic devices.

Football and other sports are eagerly engaged in at the institutions for the blind.

Many blind persons are employed in large experimental work shops and on more than one occasion they have been able to advance theories and ideas that when tested have proved to be valuable, mainly to the inventors.

As a class the blind are very cheerful and happy, and in spite of their darkness, they are in the habit of looking upon the brighter side of things.

An interesting feature of the blind magazine is being printed for free distribution among the blind, and many books and Sunday-school lesson sheets are published in point print, and these are carried free through the mails, enabling those in remote regions to obtain reading, and as most of the schools have circulating libraries and allow books to go out to responsible persons.

There is not much room for improvement in the condition of this great class of afflicted persons, who are neglected by philanthropic persons, where employment could be furnished the blind and there is room for more publications devoted to them.
