

[CONCLUDED.]

MARRIED BY MISTAKE.

BY A RANDOLPH.

"Oh, Kent! what did he say?"
 "He consented."
 "Did he? oh! I see?"
 "And he says he sooner the better; to-day, if I like so, my darling. On with your bonnet and we'll go directly to Justice Stones's. It is only a little way, and then I shall be sure of you."

Rosa shrank back.

"So soon, Kent? Oh! I cannot."

He looked at her reproachfully.

"Have we waited all these months, only to let the golden moment slip by when at last it comes? I thought you cared a little for me, Rosa."

She hid her face on his shoulder in mute penitence.

"Forgive me, Kent. I will do whatever you please."

So they were quietly married in the cool, shady park of the country justice; and no satin and pearl clad bride was ever pleasanter to look upon than Rosa Millet in her blushing morning dress, with blue porcelain buttons down the front, and an azure ribbon in her velvet brown hair.

As they did not make any particular haste in their quiet homeward ramble through the can October glens, it happened that Squib Millet and his plump wife were driving up to the gate, just as they entered. Rosa tried to draw her hand out of Kent Lorimer's arm, but he held resolutely to it.

"Oh, here you be!" exclaimed the jovial Squire. "This is my wife, Mr. Lorimer.—Rebecca, his be's the young feller that wants the cover medder."

"I beg your pardon, sir," interposed the Mr. Lorimer, with great composure—he had anticipated some such denouement to the unaccountable misunderstanding of the morning; "it was not your clover meadow that I wanted; it was your daughter."

"My daughter!" echoed the Squire, in open-mouthed astonishment.

"And you were kind enough to consent, went on Kent, glibly, 'and even intimated that to-day would scarcely be too early to suit you, we have just been married.'"

The Squire started—so did Mrs. Millet. "Ain't your name Zephaniah Lorimer?"

"No, sir; my name is Kent Lorimer."

"By Jehosaphat!" ejaculated the Squire, bringing his clenched hand down on his knee, "you're the wrong man."

He was silent a moment. Mrs. Millet (good soul—she had been on the side of true love all the while) exchanged sympathetic glances with blushing little Rosa, and Mr. Kent Lorimer awaited the result of affairs with imperturbable coolness.

"Then you're really married to my gal, young man?" muttered the poor Squire.

"Yes, sir."

"You—you couldn't go and get unmarried again, could you?" hesitatingly asked Mr. Millet, while a faint gleam of hope irradiated his countenance.

"No, sir—I believe not," returned Kent trying not to laugh.

"Well then," bawled the Squire, "I may as well make the best of it, though I can't help feelin' a little bit as though I'd been over-reached. Come here, Rosa; it's been a mistake all round, but somehow you don't look very sorry."

And the Squire kissed the bride in the blue gingham dress very heartily.

"I don't care," grumbled he, suddenly recurring to his wrongs: "if Zeph. Lorimer comes danglin' arter that clover medder at this time o' day, he shan't have it—I'm hanged if he shall!"

"Oh, Kent," said Rosa, looking with a mixture of tenderness and reproach at her newly made husband, "how could you deceive me so?"

"My darling, I didn't deceive you. I told you exactly what your father said."

"Ah, but you knew—you mistrusted."

"That I was the wrong man? Of course I did. But when fortune holds a golden goblet to a man's lips, he don't say, 'Excuse me, madam, but I think this belongs to some other fellow. Besides, Rosa, you ought to know that all is fair in love or war.'"

Rosa laughed and shook her pretty head, and could not help looking strangely happy even while the words of gentle reproach were on her tongue. I don't think Kent minded them very much.

Poor Zephaniah Lorimer, son of Deacon Nehemiah, was the only one totally and entirely dissatisfied with the day's bargain, for he, poor fellow, lost all chances for the 'clover medder' by being too late.

IT'S NONE OF MY BUSINESS.

BY MRS. HARRIET E. STOWE.

This was one of the golden sayings of Jedediah Pettisot. One might think so, at least, by the frequency and emphasis with which it fell from his lips. Jedediah was reckoned one of the richest men in Needwal. He lived in that great white house you see yonder, with the tufts of lilacs before each of the front windows, (Continued on page 78.)

23-1

J. G. HARDY &amp; SON.

ALL PERSONS HAVING WOOL

TO CARD

Can be accommodated at my Mill, North Temple Street, one Block East of the Temple Block, and North of President Young's premises.

THE wool must be washed clean and be picked, and there should be one pound of grease brought to every 7 pounds of wool, and the wool should be brought to the mill to be greased, as it can be done more evenly there.

I understand that there was considerable dissatisfaction expressed last season against the carder whom I employed, because of the wool being poorly carded, cut up, etc., though he professed to be an excellent carder; this season I intend to remedy this, and if good wool cannot be done I will stop the machine; for I believe that justice ought to be done to customers.

Give us clean, well-picked wool and we will give you good rolls. My price for carding is 12 1/2 cents per pound in gold or its equivalent, or one-sixth of the wool.
