In the matter of this trade there is every appearance that the public will soon be at the mercy of a powerful corporation, and, without intending any special reflection upon the U. P. Company, the experience of the people in every section of the country has taught them that, as a rule, corporations have no consciences. However, the matter of the coal trade being controlled in the manner referred to will not be likely to affect the consumers of the article for the time being, as a sound financial policy on the part of the U. P. Company would scarcely lead them to make a sudden leap upward from present rates, but rather the leverse. An insiduous, gradual ascending tendency after a while, would be more likely.
