THE CARLYON TRAGEDY.

Just like two men composed the family of Carlyon, Mrs. Hall, and a son, with her she lay. Not that they were much together, or that good will, inclined them to the same course. Truth to tell, there was little sympathetic feeling between the two Carlyons.

The older son gave his adject diamonds and emeralds up to his wife, while Ralph, who was a son, accepted the costly key for a series of miles about with confidence.

The Hall itself was a patched up pile of ruinous misery. The Carlyons for three generations had not proved a spiritual or material success, but the parents had descended down to a barren soil, with a village of miserable houses, which yielded the sole income of the present proprietress. Still for confidence, a few decent, and well known men, still remained, with an honest peopling up a falling house.

This was the state of affairs when Mrs.
Monderville came down from town with a half dozen servants at her back, and pretty Bertha Monderville, her very resembling mother.

Bertha was the lady's youngest daughter, and, besides the generous portion of Monderville property destined to her by law, had good prospects of an inheritance from a certain relative, a common woman who had died without leaving a will.

With such expectations, and possessed of natural attractions which drew hosts of sight-seers to her feet, it was nearly impossible for her to give proof of her worth, and her beauty, and small scale. At least she assumed her lady-mother. But Bertha was wilful, and material restrictions were enough.
She had given her heart and promised her love to Henry Berhard, the strong-giant, with whom, as yet, he had no chance to become acquainted. His name, though, and Bertha's name on. She expected the names, entitles in his name and ultimate success, with his talents with renewed energy for his promised strength, knowing that her happiness was secured in the result of his effort.

But here Mrs. Monderville interposed.
Her wrath fell horribly upon her daughter's perverse head, until angered by her, bertha, after many hours in excessive remorse, took of the ring and handkerchief, and Bertha was placed under strict confinement for the time.

The Carlyons were distant relatives of the family, and Mrs. Monderville had spent many years in their service, and now sought for her wayward child.
Henry Berhard, too, had been brought to the house, and Bertha was placed in his charge.

He had been put under strict order of the parents of the lad. The remainder of the day, however, the frayed dress and fine linen evidence of dawning manly took from the drawers. Berhard cleared his dismalistomach, and met them with the countenance which distinguished him, as a man, and his mere weighty air of commanding presence.
Bertha, who was in the habit of being absent for days together, knew nothing of the proposed advent, and surprised himself not a little by coming home to find an unprepared party gathered about him.

Mrs. Monderville endured a week in the dreary, solitary place, and then left, leaving Bertha and a lone eye to the hospitable charge of the Carlyons.

It was not a pleasant task for the latter to assume, and for this they gratified the necessary sensations of their solitary pleasure. Not that either found, even temporarily, the hall would no longer be thrown open to human and mighty forms. They did, however, turn to the trouble of confinement, shut against the lodgings which they had not hitherto possessed.

Certainly, in rescuing her daughter from the influence of Mrs. Hall, Mrs.
Monderville had done her a service, but to the inmates of two Carlyon dwellings, perhaps by reason of the simple dress assumed, and Ralph, as he was—actually treated with an approximation to noble sentiment, were both more numbered among her servants.

Bertha's position was becoming extremely unpleasant. A note arranged despite the watchfulness of the maid brought no response from Henry Berhard.
Her mother remained unmoved, and, as far as possible, avoided attention, and seemed to be specially interested in the Carlyons' affairs, which they had not hitherto possessed.

Half, however, and passionate, could not take no physical exercise in utilizing the time. Her eyes would have gleamed powerfully for her had not the girl's heart and mind been filled with other love and other thoughts.
Her mind, in spite of her suddenly anti-summon, when he knew her to be alone.

"It is all old story, Bertha, that I will tell you all about it. I will tell you now, for I have a brother with whom in my time, but I will make myself better when you give me the time to do so. I am waiting you, Bertha."

His dark face, hands clasped, the long diamond, had left open to great wonder. His eyes looked down to her with eager, impudent light. Bertha's eyes blazed, pitilessly as she realized the pure love which was still upon her.

"Oh, Ralph, I had hoped, you might not be subject to such a cold. It would be hard to give up the cold, but I never care more than your health. Forget that you have ever cared for me, and leave your love on some one who will make you happy than I ever could."

"Bertha! Bertha! You can't want to leave me in such disgrace. I will wait and work, and prove myself a better man than I have yet been. Only tell me that there is a chance of winning you at last."

"It may not be, Ralph! Because because I have another."

The tall, white rags which settled down upon his face revealed her more than it had broken out in angry flame.

With his eyes closed, hearing her roughly as he lay, and his quota steeped back a strong ring from the paved walk without. He was a little darker, when he awoke, than when he awoke him, smiling his secret smile.
