SUNSHINE,

OR,

ONE OF KATIE ROBERTS DAYS.

What a habit I have had of scolding and fretting, and yet I remember when I scarcely spoke a harsh word. I have been taking up a burden harder to bear than that of the old chief. Will you not help me to unbind it, children? Already Katie has loosened some cords.

'Dear grandpa,' said Katie, 'I am sure we will—all of us; and you mustn't let us get any burdens. I'm sure I shall always think about the wise old chief when I begin to form any evil habits.'

'Did you have a good time the rest of your visit?' asked James.

'Oh yes, excellent; and after that Tomahonta grew so good and brave and dutiful that the whole tribe were proud of him.'

It was a sad day for me when they all went to the far west.'

'How good it was though,' said Rob, 'that they didn't scold him or whip him, but treated him like a man.'

Mr. Roberts had come in from his labors, and had heard the story of Tomahonta, and also Robert's remark, and it was noticed that he scolded his boys less ever after.

'Now, grandpa,' said Katie, 'we are to take your picture, for the apples are all done, and the hands of the clock are flying around toward nine. What a nice time we have had! I feel as if I had been away visiting the most beautiful place, and had come back to the best home in all the world. It seems just like summer.'

Katie followed the directions for taking the profiles, and soon had a family gallery, much to the amusement of all. When the cordial good-night had been spoken by all, and Katie laid her head down on her pillow, it seemed to her that the beauty and goodness of all the day was floating about her, and as the words of her simple prayer were spoken—'May I sleep in peace, and awake to be very good and very happy,' it seemed to her that the loving angels heard and gave her a blessing.

Thus ended one of Katie Robert's days. What had she done? Made an old man happy, kept her cousins from evil, made them love their books, and helped them to begin to reform their bad habits; and yet she did it all as the sunshine sheds its blessings—by letting her love show itself, and she did no more than any little girl or boy can do who will cherish a loving disposition.

A DEAD SEA APPLE.

"Put not your trust in Princes."—Psalms 13, iii.

Miss Imogene Fraser pined for a prince.

I don't mean a common prince, like that snuffy old Russian fellow we used to see about town, wearing a greasy fur collar, partaking of garlic and brandy three times diurnally, and growling at everything American in the most detestable English. Nothing of the kind.

She pined for a prince such as we read about in the fine old sentimental novels that amused our fathers and mothers in the flower of their youth—a Thaddeus of Warsaw, all talent and valor, and tenderness, and musical voice, and fine rolling eyes, and pedigree, and that sort of thing.

For my part, I don't believe in such princes.

The Prince of Wales wasn't one of that species, and I fear they have gone out with the old sentimental novels.

Nothing else, however, would suit Miss Imogene Fraser.

Being not totally unlike other fair dam-

sels of twenty or thereabouts, she desired to experiment upon the estate matrimonial, and had plenty of excellent opportunities, but no mortal of common clay would do. A prince she must have, or single she would remain.

Now, a real good writer of sentimental stories could create such a being especially for the emergency, and after the customary amount of tantalization, through the medium of an obdurate parent, or what not, marry off Miss Imogene to her prince in the most satisfactory style.

But I never was good at sentimental creation. I must write about the kind of people I know and see.

I am sorry for the Imogenes: I've seen plenty of them, but what sort of princes did they marry? One now pours tea for a little gray-faced exchange broker. Another is the spouse of a strapping farmer, with large yellow teeth like ancient grave-stones. Another wedded a small subdued German, who plays a clarinet in a cheap orchestra, and has to move monthly because he can't pay his rent. Another—but the catalogue grows melancholy.

Thus with all the Imogenes. They go on pining for princes who never come; marrying all sorts of people instead, and, dying, give way to a fresh generation of Imogenes, who follow in their mama's footsteps with a disregard of experience that savors of the sublime.

One of the nicest watering-places in the world is that paradisiac spot known as Belle Lake. It is romantic and comfortable at once, two qualifications rarely found together. There is delightful bathing, rowing, sailing, and fishing in the lake itself, and the shady groves that line its shores are cool and green and mysterious, suggesting dryads and nymphs and fairies and things. That is, if you happen to have a poetic turn of mind. If not, they only suggest flirtation.

I will not farther expatiate upon the delights of Belle Lake, lest you should fancy I have lots for sale in that vicinity; whereas, I have none anywhere—not even a burial lot, and that I believe is the common lot of all.

Neither did Imogene Fraser have any real estate to dispose of, but she thought just as I do, and passed much of her time every summer in the fair demesnes that lie smilingly adjacent to the Belle Lake Pavilion.

She dressed with charming simplicity for breakfast, and strolled listlessly in the maple-lined avenue till bathing-time. After bathing, a trip to the island, in some jaunty little sail-boat, whiled away the hours till the dinner toilet. After dinner, a siesta; making and receiving calls till tea; and after tea, the Pavilion Informal Hop every evening. Then gossip; and finally, bed.

Such are the round of pleasures that my heroine—I suppose she is "my heroine"—pursued; but they could not stifle her in-
