The mental attitude of the jury seems to have been one which led them to declare that a man who kills the paramour of his wife ought not to be punished. Of course, such a verdict sets the law at defiance. But there are some things stronger and more sacred than law. There are things that all men by their instincts and intuitions recognize as right, which may be in certain times and places forbidden by positive law. According to the strict letter of the law there is ne shadow of doubt that Muybridge was guilty of murder. The act of houlcide was characterized by every trait which fixes the crime as murder. It was deliberate, preovery trait which fixes the crime as murder.
