A COMMENDABLE MOVEMENT.

One of the best movements that has been started of late in this city is the organization called "The Merchants and Manufacturers' Association," composed of about sixty five business men, whose object is to take measures for the establishment here of manufacturing institutions. Their meeting on Monday evening exhibited a determination to do something practical along this line. It was not all speculation. A committee was appointed to make a canvass to find out what factories and industries are needed and can be erected with a prospect of success. From the character of the gentlemen forming that committee, we judge that something real is intended and is likely to grow out of their efforts, backed by the association.

More commercial advancement and real estate transactions do not meet the requirements of this community. Home industries are the great desideratum. While the opportunities for employment of female labor are ample, the avenues to profitable work for young men seem to be very meagre, if not in some instances closed up. The saying, "Idleness is the devil's workshop," is true, but true, and there are hundreds of our youth who are among the unemployed. If manufacturing industries can be started and maintained, even at a small profit on the capital invested, they will lead to other enterprises, and all will be of vast benefit to the community.

This was one of the urgent policies of the late President Brigham Young. He showed his faith as to home industries and their benefits by his works. The original title of the institution known as Z. C. M. I. was Zion's Co-operative Mercantile and Manufacturing Institution. Although the latter M. has been dropped from the sign of that establishment, it has always conducted some manufacture and still has a large boot and shoe and overalls annex to its premises, which does a flourishing trade and gives employment to hundreds of hands. But of late years the commercial side of our co-operative establishments has been the chief object in view, because capital is timid and very slow to invest in those industrial pursuits which do not warrant big dividends on investments.

We believe that success in the direction started by the association organized on Monday evening, will prove of far more benefit than a rise in the value of real estate, large dividends from mercantile and financial firms and corporations, and the mere influx of population. These will all accrue from the establishment of manufacturing establishments which will give employment to a large number of working people.

We have had this matter in mind for many years, but have seen little or no prospect of its realization. Now we are in hope that something practical will be accomplished, and feel that the movement ought to be encouraged by people of all classes and conditions. The "News" will be pleased to give particulars of the progress of the good work, and to do all that is in its power to crown with success the efforts of those who engage in the enterprise.

A READABLE REVIEW.

A neat brochure has just been issued from the press of the Deseret News, in reply to an article published in the Atlantic Monthly for December, 1899, and resuscitated by the Reorganizing Herald of June 21, 1905. This review is from the facile pen of Bishop Orson F. Whitney, one of the Assistant Historians of the Church. It contains 98 pages of readable print on good paper, and will be placed for sale in the Deseret News book store.

The title of this book is "The Mormon Prophet's Tragedy," which headed the article in the Atlantic Monthly, written by the late John Hay. The occasion for noticing it was its republication by the Reorganizing Herald, which was totally unequalled for and served only to put the esteemed and learned statesman in an unfavorable position, and to vent the malice of the writers on the Reorganizing publication. But it contained so much of error that ought not to obtain currency without refutation, that Elder Whitney decided to review it, point out the mistakes which occur so frequently in the article, and defend the character of the Prophet and Patriarch, who were victims of the "tragedy" which formed the subject of the Hay article.

The reviewer, while pointing out those inaccuracies, pays a glowing tribute to the deceased writer, philosopher and statesman, and shows that what he wrote for the Atlantic Monthly was contributed in his younger and inexperienced years, and that his alleged information came not from acquaintance with the persons or subjects of which he treated, but from anti-Mormon sources and publications on which no reliance ought to have been placed.

The review by Elder Whitney takes in the subject of the introduction of plural marriage by the Prophet Joseph Smith, and evidence of his practice of that principle contrasted with the licentious notions and defangs of John C. Bennett and others, under the name of spiritual wifehood. The tragedy at Nauvoo is fully related, with an account of the trial and acquittal of the murderers and many incidents in the history of the Saints during the Nauvoo persecutions, and their exodus from the State of Illinois. It is written in the author's well known lucid, graphic and poetic style, and will be found well worthy the perusal of our people and of distribution throughout the world. It is a valuable contribution to Church literature.

ABOLISH THE BRUTALITY.

We are gratified at the movement which is, apparently, being inaugurated for the modification or abolition of the brutal features of the "game" of football. Athletics naturally form a part of the exercises of collegiate institutions, because it is desirable that physical training shall be encouraged, to the extent of developing the muscles as well as the mind. But there is no necessity for such violent exertions and contests as occur in the modern form of football.

A great noise is made when, in a glove contest, a professional pugilist is "knocked out" in a square stand-up match, in which he can defend himself from his competitor; but the victim of a crowd of lusty, husky students of an educational establishment who pounce upon him, batter and bruise him, and sometimes trample the life out of him, is named by an incident in a playful "game."

We do not apologize for either form of violence, but merely bring the two into comparison. We believe the latter to be more reprehensible than the former and that it has resulted in more fatalities, while the injuries received by the unfortunate victims of football brutality are too numerous to specify and too serious to describe.

Unless this so-called "game" can be modified by stringent rules for the prevention of the evil results which have accrued from it, such struggles will have to be excluded from our colleges and universities, and penalties be imposed upon the perpetrators of the brutal onslaughts that have brought these contests into public condemnation. We see no reason, however, why regulations for the conduct of football games cannot be established and maintained, in the way of restrictions from brutality and violence and for the protection of all who engage in the exercise. It might be made a beneficial form of athletics, instead of an exhibition of vicious force, without regard to limb or life. Let the good work of reform in this particular go on, and if that cannot be made effectual, let the law provide a sufficient remedy.

KING HAKON.

The Norwegians have decided for the continuation of the monarchical form of government. The announcement is surprising to those who know how general the republican sentiment has been for many years, in the country. The influence of foreign governments must have been strong upon the present leaders of the affairs of the state, to cause them to abandon the well-defined policy of the Liberal party. Nothing short of a fear that recognition for a republic would meet with insurmountable difficulties, accounts for the result of the plebiscite. When even Bjornstjerne Bjornson, the great admirer of republican forms of government, comes out for a king, there must be important reasons, even if these are not apparent to the general public.

The selection of Prince Charles, of the Danish royal house, is undoubtedly the very best that could be made, after the refusal of the Bernadottes to accept the honor. The Prince is the second son of the Danish Crown-prince and the Swedish princess, Louise, the daughter of the late Charles XV, King Oscar's brother and predecessor on the dual throne. Charles is, therefore, on his mother's side, a Bernadotte, closely related to the deposed monarch. He was born in 1870, and in 1898 he married Princess Maud, third daughter of King Edward of England. He therefore brings to the throne, if he accepts the call of the people, such prestige as may come from relationship with a great ruler. And this is not an insignificant matter when a new dynasty is about to be established. The question of finding kings for vacant thrones is not always very simple. Eligible home material is scarce. The Greeks, too, had to go to Denmark for a king. For Roumania a Hohenzollern was found. Germany, it is thought, does not look with favor upon the selection of the Danish prince, because it means an English princess as queen in Norway, and, in the course of time, another lady of the royal house of Great Britain as queen in Sweden. This, it has been asserted, does not suit the German Emperor. But the selection is, nevertheless, the very best that could be made and it is to be presumed that German objections will be removed, or overruled.

If the Danish prince accepts the throne, as he undoubtedly will do, he intends, it is said, to perform his kingly duties under the famous name of Hakon. By so doing he takes up, as it were, the broken thread of Norwegian history where the last really independent king of that country, also a Hakon, left it. This was the last male descendant of Harald Haarfagre, one of the most prominent heroes of ancient sagas. When the first Hakon came to rule Norway and bring peace to the country that had been devastated by Erik Bloodaxe, the people received him as the persecuted Haarfagre. So much did he resemble his father, he had lived in England as foster brother to King Athelstan and had become converted to Christianity. As soon as practicable, he laid plans for the conversion of his pagan subjects. But in this he was not successful. He went to England for a bishop and priests, and issued a decree forbidding the people to sacrifice to the old gods. The people, however, refused point blank to obey. Hakon called a great assembly and preached a passionate missionary sermon, calling upon the people to turn away from their stone and wooden images, and to be baptized. But, according to the saga, the end of his sermon was drowned in howls and execrations from the multitude. An old peasant rose in reply to the king, and said that since their forefathers were better men than they, the faith that was good enough for them was certainly good enough for the men of the present. This argument carried the day. The people clamored for the gods of their fathers, and the king was actually made to choose between Christianity and his throne. Hakon chose his throne. And, finally, he was buried with pagan ceremonies and sent to Valhalla. The last of the Hakons reigned during the early part of the fourteenth century, immediately before the union of the three Scandinavian countries under Queen Margaret.

And now, that the separation of Sweden and Norway is completed, it may be of interest to recall the fact again that the Norwegians entertain, if their public utterances express their sentiments, the most kindly feelings for the deposed king, whom they cannot charge with a single overt act. This is really strange. But it is a fact, unique, we believe, in the history of revolutions. Recently the Norwegian influential journal, Aftenposten, paid a most flattering tribute to King Oscar. It pointed out that he has always been a power for mediation and reconciliation in the differences that have arisen, and that he had even sacrificed much for the sake of peace. "No monarch," the paper says, "since the days of Hakon VI, knew Norway, through personal experience, as he. And wherever the tall, stately monarch went, he won the hearts of all. His sincere character, his interest in the well-being of the people, his brilliant representative qualities are engraved on our memory. And for years to come, the Norwegian people will describe, during the long winter evenings, to their children and children's children the dignified personality of the last union king, and repeat his beautiful sayings." Is there in all history another instance of a revolt against a prince to whom even his opponents must bow in respectful reverence? In the case of Cuba there was a righteous indignation against a long course of oppression and injustice and cruel warfare on the part of Spain. In the case of Panama there was the feeling that the best interests and rights of the country were recklessly subordinated to the selfish designs of a clique of politicians at Bogota. The remarkable feature of the Norwegian "revolution" was the friendly tone in which King Oscar and the Swedish nation have been spoken of in all official and unofficial utterances of representative Norwegians.

The world will unite in congratulating the Danish Prince and the Norwegian people, and in hoping for them a continuation of the era of peace, and prosperity that commenced with the union of 1814. There is no reason why this should be interrupted, as long as unity and harmony prevail in the councils of the nation.

Stolen offices are sweet and graft enjoyed in secret.

Carrying the Russian revolt to Vladivostok is carrying it to extremes.

Mary never could have afforded a little lamb at the prices ruling today.

This is the kind of Indian summer weather old men's mothers used to make.

Hearst was always a good deal of an athlete but no one ever suspected that he could run like he did.

The sooner the Poles learn that autonomy for Poland is an idleness; dream and act accordingly, the better it will be for them and their country.

The Hearst-McClellan fight over going behind the returns recalls the far more famous Tilden-Hayes contest. But where is the man who shall play the part of Cronin?

It is rather amusing to see old time opponents coming over to the support of Mayor Weaver. But the fact that they do come over shows better than anything else which way the current sets.

The story comes from the City of Mexico that Great Britain and Japan are going to build a transisthmian canal over the Nicaragua route, the former to furnish the capital, the latter the labor. The story is so palpably absurd that it does not even provoke a laugh. But it shows that imagination, and of the Quixotic order, too, is not dead in our sister republic.

Asked by Mr. Hughes if he was willing to serve for seventy-five thousand dollars a year, James Hazen Hyde replied that he was, and that he did not know where else he could get the same salary. Of course he didn't nor does anybody else. And where could the McCalls and the McDurries get anything approaching the salaries they now receive from their companies? Nowhere, unless in Utopia.

When Prince Louis of Battenberg shall have sailed away and society's head has had time to cool, it may be discovered that the Prince had a quiet little sarcastic way that was unsuspected. Just read this comment on the horse show: "It was wonderful, such beautiful women and such magnificent gowns. But some time before the end of my visit I am going to see the horses."

That protest against railroad rate legislation presented to the President by representatives of the five great railway employees' organizations bears the hall mark of the general officials rather than of the employees. Still the question is a most important one, the most important before the people at the present time, and should be considered without prejudice and from every point of view.

BAD ADVICE.

Cleveland Plain Dealer.
When Sir Henry Irving made his appearance as Hamlet in Manchester the "properties" were very different from those with which he surrounded himself later at the Lyceum in London, and night after night he made his speech, "Alas, poor Yorick!" to a blackened turnip and beheaded King Claudius in the last act majestically drinking to his success from a marmalade jar in the stately disguise of varnished gold paint. "Hamlet" was the first play Sir Henry Irving saw as a boy. Samuel Phelps was in the title role. Some time afterward Phelps was persuaded to listen to a recitation by Irving, and after praising the young man the celebrated actor gave him this characteristic advice: "Young man have nothing to do with the stage; it is a bad profession."

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

Profitable Advertising for November is called "The International Edition." It is a most beautiful product of the printer's art, and its comprehensive articles and advertisements from many countries are of intense interest to business men. Besides the editorial section in which such topics as "Foreign Markets for American Products," and "The American Market for Foreign Products," are discussed, interesting papers are found in the various other sections into which the magazine is divided. These are: "British Section," "Continental Section," the "American Section," and the "General Section."—140 Boylston street, Boston.

The November number of the American Boy comes with reading matter and illustrations appropriate to the season. One of the interesting articles is on the "Boyhood of Great Americans." The first of the series is on U. S. Grant.—Sprague Publishing Co., Detroit, Mich.

The December issue of The Popular Magazine has an absorbing novel called "The Craft of Kings" by Louis Joseph Vance, author of the well-known book, "The Great American Gentleman Adventurer." There are also five excellent serial stories, including a new one by Richard Marsh, and a dozen short stories.—Street & Smith, New York.

"Faulty Diction" is the title of a little publication that should fill a long-felt want. It is by Thos. H. Russell, editor of Webster's Imperial Dictionary, and contains, in alphabetical order, a collection of words and phrases frequently used incorrectly by speakers and writers of the English language. The book is issued in vest-pocket size, printed on fine paper. Illustrating the comprehensive treatment that has been given the subject by the author, there are 107 headings treated in the book under some of which—"plurals" for instance—over 50 errors that are not at all unusual are to be found illustrated and corrected.—Geo. W. Ogilvie & Co., Publishers, 159 E. Randolph St., Chicago, Ill.

One hundred contributors of text and picture make the November National a richly varied and picturesque report of the current life of America. Yone Noguchi's "With Rossetti in London" and Poulney Bigelow's "The First Lady of China" are papers that strike the note of universal interest. Captain Arthur McGraw reviews recent and current north polar expeditions. Charles Warren Stoddard, in "The Doom of a Prima Donna," tells the story of the strange life and the fearful death of a world-famous singer. Michael A. Lane ridicules "Boston peace advocates" in "The Good There is in War." Joe Mitchell Chapple presents 16 pages of gossip, lavishly illustrated, about "Affairs at Washington." Frank Putnam discusses insurance revelations under the suggestive heading, "Is Thieving a Safe and Gentle Profession?" Hamilton Wright tells the completed story, with illustrations, of national irrigation works done to date. The negro problem, the new Methodist hymnal, the President's appeal to the people over the head of the senate, and the stage, are among the other topics discussed.—Chapple Pub. Co., Boston.
