

LOGAN.

LOGAN, UTAH. - JUNE 17, 1895.

B. Y. College Exercises.

Wednesday and Thursday witnessed the graduating exercises of the Agricultural and Mechanical, by the great speaker and reader, Brigham Young. On Wednesday evening the Annual Association had its meeting in the open house, which was crowded. Among the prominent speakers were Ex-Exes, Prof. Young, and Moses Tanner, ex-president of Asaph's Presiding Bishop. President, Orson and Isaac Smith, the state presbytery, and Gen. W. T. Sherman, president of the Logan A. M. C., and board of directors. A pleasant musical program was interspersed with the speeches.

Joseph E. Carlson, president of the association, addressed an audience on the history of education, which was trained from the earliest time in both Old and New Testament. His growth and progress were followed and Orson and Carlson had thoughtful words interspersed with the speeches.

President Brigham Young, at the general B. Y. meeting, recalled his days in Cache County in 1855, when he had been called to go with a party to locate the line between Utah and Oregon, as well as the country north of the valley, where he was then sent.

Afterward, in company with a party of young men, he was sent to see if the country could be colonized; as the report was that first fell every night. They brought back a favorable report, and so the site of the college farm first did fall every night during June, July and August of that year, and the winter was so bitter that their stock died.

The first general settlement was made in the fall, but the first fall of snow, the Lord would scatter the elements here so he had elsewhere, where such had been fully justified.

He congratulated the college on its rapid progress since its location in 1855, and said that it had grown from a single room occupying a rented building, into a college worthy the name, and occupying its own main structures. Only one other occupied by the students, and the remaining time for the instruction of students in the mechanical and domestic arts, and the most busy was some with its greatest revenues. The speaker was as firm in his belief in the right of self-government as was his father. The general drift of gratitude is toward the professors, and while teachers, lawyers and doctors are necessary, all are not fitted for the pursuit of law or medicine, and a good government is suited to make an indifferent professional man. Given the opportunity, the students could do well along the fine line had adopted him.

Prof. W. J. Hart, president of the B. Y. College, reviewed the college's history and progress, more particularly during the last eight years. At the beginning of that period it employed only three instructors, now it has thirteen. One hundred students were in the class during the last academic year. There had been an increase from 150 to 240 students. This year 100, the first students to take baccalaureate degrees, and their title of B. S. would be given to them by the educational institutions in the United States. The number of graduates was not as large this year as last, for the reason that one year's students' work had been wholly transferred.

Father and son, the Agassiz meeting gave its banquet at the Stake Hotel, where one hundred邀請者 had been laid, and even that number was found insufficient.

On the second commencement exercises were held, and the open house was filled with an attentive and appreciative audience. As on the previous evening, music enlivened the pauses between the various addresses. John H. Farnham, a graduate of the college, delivered an address on the "Child Growth," which touched the building of the child's intellect and heart through the various stages of development.

Miles L. Taylor, one of the advanced members, spoke on the subject of her studies, "Health in Education," and proved that health is all-powerful here as elsewhere, and just as great a factor in the success or failure of the student.

Prof. E. G. Brown, one of the faculty, who has been interestingly parsing certain courses while acting as instructor, had conferred on him the B. S. degree, delivered the address, "The Day, His Strength, and His Work," at the University of Utah.

Mr. Cassell, the elderly lady of Paraske who has been writing in covering the names of the distinguished physicians.
