EVENING NEWS.

Tuesday - - March 26, 1878.

A PICTURE OF HOME LIFE.

A writer in one of the magazines advocates a reform in the home circle. He says there are parents who are the life of every company they enter, but at home are dull and silent. If they have not mental stores sufficient for both places, he recommends that they give home the preference. A silent home, he says, is a dull place for young people, from which they will escape if they can, but how much of unconscious but excellent mental training is given in lively, social argument.

The magazine containing this essay fell into the hands of Mr. Barbary, the other morning. Mr. Barbary keeps a store, and has a family consisting of a wife and two children, equally divided among the sexes. It was a rainy, sloppy, dreary day, and the store was empty of customers. Mr. Barbary sat at his desk, with the open book before him, and his mind pondering over the article. Business cares had pressed heavily upon him in the past year, tending to dull his entertaining faculties by turning every channel of thought into his business. He had been quick at his meals, absorbed in store matters, and filled with gloom of anticipated troubles. As he read and pondered over this article, its truth was forced upon him. He had been wrong in the past. He was not just to himself, and certainly not to his children. These were not pleasant reflections to Mr. Barbary, for he was very proud of his children. They were growing up in a depressing atmosphere. He was making a dull home for them. He looked around the empty store and through the window into the damp, deserted street. It was a gloomy spectacle. He felt its influence weighing upon his spirits, and then came the thought to him that this was but a type of what he was making his home day by day. Mr. Barbary shivered.

"I'll do different than this," he said, smiting his hands together. "I'll commence this very day."

As he said it, the noon whistle sounded, and he prepared to go to his dinner.

On the way home he conned over a suitable subject for a lively social argument with his wife. There were an abundance of topics suggested, but they were not at all suited for the mental sustenance of his boy and girl. It must be something that could be taken within the caliber of their minds, and something that would improve as well as entertain. Mr. Barbary thought very hard upon this matter. There were the silver bill and the Indian business, and civil service, and temperance, and commerce, and a host of other things, political, social and scientific, but nothing that struck him just right. Mr. Barbary grew more and more absorbed, and bent his brain rigidly toward the point in hand, but nothing would come of it. As Mr. Barbary had a note for $318 due at the bank at 3 o'clock, and had but $78 92 towards it, perhaps the problem as to where the $240 00 were to come from may have had a tendency to impair the free flow of his thoughts. However this may be, he approached his home without having selected a proper subject for lively, social argument. Mr. Barbary need not have taken all this trouble in preparation. A subject was in waiting in embryo for him. There was no lack of subjects, as it afterwards transpired. As in many other pursuits, that which we have looked for afar off subsequently is discovered to have been right under our hand.

Mr. Barbary entered the house with a strong determination to inaugurate a reform, although he was not at all certain as to the steps leading up to it. Mrs. Barbary was laying the table as he entered. There was a smile on his face; a smile got up expressly for the occasion, and quite a success in its way. Mrs. Barbary saw the smile on her husband's face. At the same time she detected something else. In fact, it may be said that Mrs. Barbary took in both extremes of his person at once. She was a tired woman, as women are apt to be at this hour. She said:

"What on earth do you mean, lugging in a bushel of mud into the house? Can't you see the mat? or are you blind?"

Now Mr. Barbary could have seen the mat, and would have seen and used it, had not his mind been so closely engrossed in seeking for a topic for a lively, social argument. He was conscious that he had done no wrong, still he felt that he might consistently give up the smile, as it appeared to be of no particular use at the present juncture. So his face straightened as he stepped hastily back on the stoop to cleanse his boots.

"Sakes alive! why don't you shut that door?" screamed Mrs. Barbary.

"What's the use of yelling like that?" he demanded, as he stepped inside and closed the door.

"What's the use of being so stupid then?" she retorted.

Mr. Barbary made no reply. The smile had gone entirely from his face. Her eyes snapped. Mr. Barbary looked at her and silently rubbed his head. He was evidently reaching out for something suitable to a lively, social argument, without being strongly buoyed up with a hope of securing it. The boy and girl were sitting back of the stove, looking stolidly at nothing in particular. Their young lives were drifting slowly but surely into an arid waste. Mr. Barbary sighed. If he could only think of something. He fell to thinking of the railroad, and this led his mind on to New York. There, like many another comer, it lost itself in the whirl of sounds and the multiplicity of objects, finally to emerge with great suddenness. Mr. Barbary had struck a subject—something for a lively, social argument. Floating over the city, diving through here and out of there, Mr. Barbary's mind ran against the East River bridge. His face brightened up at once.

"Matilda," he exclaimed, addressing his wife.

"Well?"

It was a very simple word, but it come from his wife's lips so short and hard that Mr. Barbary felt as if it were a trip-hammer under which he had mysteriously got himself. His courage sank, but a glance at the blank faces of his children nerved him up for the trial.

"Do you know what I was just thinking of?"

"I know what you wasn't thinking of, and that's of more consequence," she answered. "You wasn't thinking that there's got to be a scuttle of coals to be got up."

With a groan, Mr. Barbary seized the scuttle and and bolted down to the cellar after the coal. This occupation served in a measure to restore his composure, and when he returned he was ready, although in a modified spirit, to take up the topic.

"I was thinking, Matilda—"

"Well, get down to the table and let's finish dinner," unceremoniously broke in Mrs. Barbary. "I've got a pile of work to do this afternoon."

Mr. Barbary stumbled into his place in a sort of maze, as if the East River bridge had suddenly risen and hit him on the back of the head. He actually gasped as he dropped in the chair. But Mrs. Barbary did not notice him. She poured the coffee in a spiteful way, and when this was done, she said:

"Did you order the kindlings?"

"I declare, I forgot all about it."

"Humph! you'd forget your head if it wasn't screwed on," commented Mrs. Barbary.

This stung Mr. Barbary. For a moment he laid down the East River bridge and faced the emergency.

"Don't you suppose I've got something else to think of besides kindlings?"

"There, lose your temper, why don't you?" retorted the injured companion of his joys and sorrows.

"Well, what's the use of your throwing things in my face?" Mr. Barbary was thinking of his note, and he felt goaded unto desperation. "You've always got something to jaw over. I never saw such a spitfire as you are getting to be." This was a grave reflection to cast, but Mr. Barbary was becoming frenzied. He cared no more for the East River bridge than he did for a one-eyed Hottentot.

"Well, you're polite, I must say," observed Mrs. Barbary, with lofty sarcasm.

Mr. Barbary started up from the table, exasperated beyond the bounds of reason.

"A man might as well try to eat in Tophet as to eat here," he savagly asserted as he got into his coat. "I was going to tell you about something, but now I'll be hanged if I do, and the children may drift into idiocy for all I care!"

And he rushed out of the house, slamming the door with such force as to make the dishes rattle, and leaving Mrs. Barbary appalled by the dark mystery of his closing words.

There is no doubt that Mr. Barbary meant well. His mistake was, we think, in failing to secure in advance the co-operation of his wife.—Danbury News.
