A PLACE OF REFUGE.

Where Grant Could Secure Safety if Scared.

Summer Hill, close to Studley, Va., is a very interesting place, built over 150 years ago, and was the scene, says the Boston Transcript, of much active warfare about the year 1862. Mrs. Newton resides there, the widow of Captain William B. Newton, a scholarly gentleman and brave commander of cavalry in General Fitzhugh Lee's brigade, who was killed at the battle of Culpeper courthouse. He was a brother of the late Bishop John Brockenbrough Newton, who died last Ascension day. Summer Hill was taken for headquarters by General Grant, and there he held a council of war with General Hancock and General McDowell. General Grant told Mrs. Newton he was expecting an attack, and that a battle would be fought under her very roof-tree, and added:

"I advise you strongly, madam, to go over into King William county with your little children. I will be glad to furnish you an ambulance and safeguard to cross the lines."

She answered: "No, I prefer to stay here. This old house is all I have left, and if the fate is to fall down it will have to fall on my head. I can put the children down in the potato cellar, and general, if you should get scared when the firing begins, you can go down there with them."

General Grant laughed heartily and said: "Have your own way, madam. You are brave enough." After the war was over he inquired very particularly of her, and expressed the hope that she came out all right.

Where England Trains Her Soldiers.

The essential difference that exists between the respective methods of Uncle Sam and John Bull for the education of their embryo officers is one of money. England demands that her cadets pay, and pay heavily, too, for their training, whereas the United States is content to pay her military pupils as well as educate them. There is but little similarity in the two systems, though the result achieved is the same. As everybody knows, nomination by one's state senator and a plain school education is sufficient to admit the young American thirsting for glory within the portals of West Point. But admission to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, where England trains her would-be "sappers" and "gunners," is a very different matter. There are two military colleges in England, the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, and the Royal Military Academy, above mentioned. At Sandhurst the cadets are trained for the cavalry and infantry branches of the service, while at Woolwich, known popularly as the "Shop," commissions are given only for the artillery and engineers—the latter being those most successful in the competitive examinations.

Entrance to these establishments is obtained only through a very severe competitive examination, held under civil service rules, and the usual medical inspection. But when the struggling student has at length overcome all difficulties his father must face a yearly bill of £100, unless he himself holds or held a commission in the army. The size of this sum, even though it be only for two years, the full course, is sufficient to debar all but scions of well-to-do families. This qualification of means is very necessary, as the young officer cannot expect to live on his pay, which is only $500 a year for some considerable time.

Once within the gates the studies and drills are very similar to those of our institution, but the social and recreative systems differ considerably. At Woolwich and Sandhurst the men of different "terms" have no common intercourse, and of late years it has become intensely bad "form" for one term to interfere with another at all.

Pay of Old-Time Architects.

As near as we can discover, the architect of "ye olden time" did not receive for his services a very exorbitant sum, says Architecture and Building. Recently some members of the French school at Delphi unearthed several [illegible]
