

Lights and Shadows of A CITY AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

FROST day to day life goes on in our city, while on the hillside the flowers are beginning to bloom near the graves of its builders, whose early-day travel and toil formed the blocks with which they laid its foundation.

"Daily the tides of life go ebbing and flowing beside them. Thousands of throbbing hearts where theirs are at rest and forever, thousands of aching brains, where theirs no longer are busy. There are no rolling heads, where there have creases from their labors. Thousands of weary feet, where theirs have completed their journey."

There are men and women in our midst today, who with their children and their children's children, are doing their part in building the turrets of a mighty work begun in the early day; and who, as they look upon the graves of these peaceful sleepers—the workers and builders of the past—will relate many sad incidents woven in the material that made for the raising up of a beautiful and permanent city.

A story is told of one of our Pioneer women, very brave, but very frail, who started out in the month of February to cross the plains in a covered wagon, alone and well nigh crazed in the heat. Shocked and heart-broken at her attempting such a hazardous journey, her father, who was a minister, came to Nauvoo to induce her to give it up and return with him to her old home. But his pleadings were vain, for this daughter was determined to go out to the west, and to do all she could for the sake of her new religion. Despite the fact of her being in delicate health, she started away with clothing insufficient to keep herself and her small family warm.

Early in the spring the rains became heavy and the roads impassable, the little company of emigrants were obliged to camp in a thicket, called Sheep Creek. It was here that this dauntless little woman was taken very ill and unable to leave her wagon. The six little children, the eldest not 12 years old, were gathered into a tent out of the pouring rain. After a time the mother's condition became alarming, and a call was sent for the doctor to come for help. None came. The sympathies of some good-hearted people in the town were aroused, however, and the poor sufferer was taken into a house where she died.

It fell to the lot of the little girl of 12 years, to mother the five younger than herself, and the burden of care and pains severely began. But the bravery of the mother who had taken the journey into that other unknown was instilled in them, and the little brood came through to the valley in good health, and with not one hair of their orphans' heads harmed. Surely, they had been tried in the furnace of the world's fire. This little sister in her early teens knew and performed her duty well, for that small family left alone and motherless on the plains, grew to manhood and womanhood, and their children are splendid men and women in our midst, today.

One day it rained on the plains, when the rain was pouring down unmercifully, and water all about was like a shallow sea; a woman was taken ill. She was placed upon a bed of bark beneath a tree, with only bark for a covering and protection from the storm. Her friends gathered around her, and long and patiently did they hold up boughs to catch the water that otherwise would have fallen in torrents upon her. And these were women who were "making their lives a prayer" to save life, and to give their strength and service and sacrifice to the support of a cause that was great and mighty.

In one company, a poor man who had been suffering from melancholia, was found one morning in a terrible condition. He had tried to end his life by cutting his wrists, and was getting breakfast that morning, and in the midst of it was attracted to the man by his moans. An awful sight for a woman! Yet, this woman did not faint, but immediately set to work to save the man's life. Many calls for medical aid came in to the woman, but receiving no response, she said: "Then I must do it myself." Her son, however, but a mere boy, unwilling to see his mother perform such a sickening task, took the needle and thread from her hands and proceeded to the act of a surgeon. She held the two ends of the wound together. The stitching went in and out as a boy stiches a ball, sure and strong and from end to end. And strange to say, the man suffered from no serious consequences, and soon the value of a good health. Success of today would marvel at this story. Yet it is true, and the purity of the atmosphere must have brought about the perfect healing.

But the nerve of this woman and her son! It only goes to prove the strength of the material put forth in the setting of a new country.

We build up character through trial, and the lone companies of the plain, through danger and hardship, surely built up courage and force that stood them in good stead when they met him before them in the valley. The companies were only from six to eight miles apart, and the Indians could have made short work of them. But, the red man must have understood. Had he not been driven from place to most all his life? And had he not done all out from home and civilization, like himself, and reaching out into the wilderness for food and shelter. It was a miracle that company after company was not cruelly massacred by these savages holding sway over the plains. The Pioneers were also good to them, and gave them food, and company after company came through without a scratch.

If "every human heart is human," and "in even savage bosoms there are yet noble longings, strivings, for the good they are deprived of," then the heart is plain, and in the little band grouping blindly in the darkness, and stamped of buffalo. Yet only one story is handed down to us of a little company that was swept out of existence in the passing of one night, through a rush of these crazed monsters of the plains in search of water.

There were only five or six wagons in this encampment on the banks of the Platte, and these had been drawn up to form a circle about a gravesite reserved for the wife of a hard day of slow travel. Small protection proved these wagons to that little company, however, for thousands of buffalo from the mountains swooped down upon it in the night, on their mad course to the river. In the morning, a few bones, skinning, and spores of skins were all that remained to tell the tale of that awful meeting of death. All of that everything, had been trampled into the ground.

What men become, devils largely upon what their wives and mothers are. When the call was made for volunteers out of a company of emigrants, to be sent in the service of the government to the front, the mothers of the men responded to the call, the wives and mothers stepped forward and took their places, and all in their power to keep up the interest and moving spirit of the emigration.

When women of such nerve and strength braved even known danger of the plains—sudden death, and terrible injury from buffalo, and prairie fire—and marched into the valley, weary, travel-worn, and foot-sore, and without husbands, fathers, and brothers there is small wonder that strong and lasting, support a beautiful structure—the City of Salt Lake.

CURED HEMORRHAGES OF THE LUNGS.

"Several years since my lungs were so badly affected that I had many hemorrhages," writes A. M. Alce, of Woodland, "I took treatment with several physicians without any benefit, until they started to bleed. Foley's Honey and Tar, and my lungs are now as sound as a bell. I recommend it in advanced stages of lung trouble." Foley's Honey and Tar stops the bleeding and cures the disease, prevents serious results from a cold. Refuse substitutes. Sold by E. J.
