Correspondence.

Paris Letter.

PARIS, May 19th, 1878.

Editors Deseret News:

One's first impressions on setting foot in a country that has been known to him only through its history, literature and art, must necessarily be crude and fresh, for the great stream of the life of a nation, like that of an individual, is neither historic, literary or esthetic. Those only who supply the American press with Paris letters, written in New York, may be supposed to be profoundly and thoroughly versed in French affairs and en rapport with the life, motives and aims, social, political and moral, of the new republic that has been grafted on to the old empire. But crude and fresh as my opinions are I propose to give them; my superficial comment may prove useful as a foil to the profound disquisition and unspeakable knowingness of the Bohemian, whose clairvoyance has saved him a most nauseous sea voyage.

On the morning of the 13th of May, I climbed down from my birth in the steamer, made a hasty toilet, and went on deck to catch a first glimpse of France. We were passing the islands of Alderney and Gurnsey, and the sight of houses, hedges, and gardens, dimly discernable in the distance, was delightful to our seasick eyes. The island of Gurnsey, it will be remembered, was the refuge of Victor Hugo in his banishment during the second empire, and its sea and scenery were the inspiration of his "Travailleures," as well as of some of the first passages of his last work, "Ninety-three." I was ruminating of these, and trying to see things through the glamour of his wonderfully poetic descriptions, when a fellow-citizen from Iowa told me something worth knowing, he said: "Those are the islands of Jersey and Alderney, where that fine breed of cows come from." We could now see Cherbourg, with its fortification, and fine artificial harbor, about ten miles distant, and anchoring near the quay, close to three French iron-clads, we embarked upon the little steamer that had come alongside to ferry us to the wharf. As we approached, we observed a crowd of people to receive us, among them was a grand and portentious military personage, with sword, epaulets, and cocked hat; one of our passengers insisted that such a distinguished looking individual could be no other than Marshal McMahon, and said that he had half expected the honor of his presence at our landing; but it proved to be only a gens d'arms, (pronounced Jonny Darms) and we soon learned that this country produced a great many like him.

Now came the inspection of our baggage. Our trunks were sent to the Custom House, but our valises passed free, with only a formal inspection. As I passed Marshal McMahon, he inquired in very good French: "Tabac?" I told him, no. "Segar?" I told him, six. This seemed to satisfy him for he merely touched the valise with the grace peculiar to his race, and said, "C' est bon," (pronounced like "shebang") which liberaly translated meant that the little "shebang" was all right, and we passed on to the cab that was to convey us to the "Hotel d' l' Aigle," or, in plain American, the Eagle House. We were next entertained with the immense amount of charioteering that a French hackman is able to do on a very small capital. Five of us, besides the driver, got into a one-horse, two-wheeled vehicle and with as much flourish and incessant crack of whip as if he had been driving on a Roman race course, he forced his horse, at a slow gallop through the clean and narrow streets of Cherbourg. At the Eagle the landlady was drawn up to receive us, flanked on one side by her sister, and on the other by a very pretty young woman, in a black alpacca dress and white apron, who seized our valises and took them to our rooms. As soon as we saw the landlady with her bowing, smiling staff, we were all more than ever convinced that we were in France, for we had seen such supernatural politeness in what we then supposed to be the exaggeration of French opera bouffe.

Later in the day we walked through the city, looked at its historic defenses, and admired the splendid colossal statue of Napoleon, inscribed with his words: "I will reproduce at Cherbourg the marvels of Egypt," and pointing with the radiating fingers of his right hand to the magnificent breakwater that he had built far out in the sea.

Among the first impressions that an American will have of France, is the great prevalence of women; they do much of the work in the hotels, cafes, fields, and even at the railway stations as flagmen and switchmen. "Where," asked one of our party, "can all the men be?" "I see few but women;" later in the day a long column of blue coated, red panalooned conscripts, all apparently between the ages of 18 and 23, marched with light jaunty step through the city and there was an answer to the question, where are the men?

I have been in Paris only two days, and at the Exposition only one day. It is quite plain that in this show France is the Alpha and Omega, that other nationalities are the etc., etc., among which the United States are discernable, but by no means imposing. I will write more particularly of the Exposition in my next.
