MISED FROM THEIR REMAINS. BUCKEYE, Clay County, Ala., August, 26th, 1885.

Editor Descret News While traveling in the summy South as a servant of God, I meet with various ideas concerning the people that formerly lababited this continent. People seem to wonder and wish they knew about them, how they came here, etc., but if they would lay aside preju-dice and search the records (Book of Mormon) of the people who built the mounds and other antiquities, all this wonder would cease, and they would be informed of things that have taken place on this continent; and besides, they would learn more of God and what is required of them in this proba-

While staying with a friend lately was lent a book or pamphlet to read containing the following account of the moundbuilders, and thinking it would be interesting and useful to the Latter-day Saints I will send it to you. It is contained in Whiford's Microcosm, Vol. 4, No. 6, March, 1885, entitled, OLDER THAN THE MOUND BUILDERS, Roanoke, Va.. "If, in this day of careful research, when science has left no region unexplored, a statement should be made revealing to public attention a nation that were in their graves when the earliest known tribes trod over the ground unsuspecting, would the testimony be accepted? It could not be challenged by other than scientific modes, and must reveal that what is hidden to the eye of research is often made manifest to chance ramblers, for there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed. What a comfort it would be to fix the date when the mound builder roamed the continent. They came in mysterious bands, those old skillful workers in the mold and clay—shall we say in copper and wood? Their lives are velled, that history might not read them, and they laid them down to sleep amid the traditions of their wor-ship. They rest amid the monuments of their blind faith. And thus from their silent graves they hold up feeble hands pointing us to their habits and their records. Dead though they be and unchronicled their doings, they give us to guess the tragedy of their lives and speak of wanderings, of searches of the mindqueries and hearttrials of simple wondering life-up answered questions they must have been. For knowledge to their eyes her ample page rich with the spoils of time id never unroll. Yet as we wander through the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys their rude horse shoe mounds lead us to think of restful, simple faith, of temples and cemeteries long before shrines or vaults were known. But what if now-while our minds are battling with the mazes of this early time and striving to grasp the customs and antiquity of those primal men and women-what if spectre-like there rises up before us the phantom of an earlier day, beckoning still backward to the homes of an alleged older people. And what if, when we see their resting-place the ongue of evidence be unloosened to tell us of their broader culture and higher faith! Let us not be blind or brased; what better can we do than, with the Tuscan of old humbly ex-claim, Mirabile dictu? brough ages where the ngut oreaks a the uncertain dawn before un pondered silent awe upon the character and period of the anciet mound-outlders when lo, travellug in the mountains of southeast Virginia, I found my sacri-legious feet among the resting places of a people whose name I had never heard, whose lives I take it are to the world an unwritten scroll. But they press forward to be known. We mus ask, "Who were these strangers in the land? When did they live?" We must learn from their customs and our im perfect knowledge of those customa. Imperiect we say-for we know them only in death, thanks to the fact that they did not cremate. Time has left but imperfect vestiges of their forms none of their instruments and uten Accident again brought us upon a plantation in Montgomery County, Va. where these sleeping forms were disturned by hundreds and by fittes. Tal. is literally true, and now we gite the two facts that are remarkable abquickly distinguish them from others

s yet written of or known.
First, they lay with hands folded ever the breast. Second, they lie is rectangles, whose sides bearing ratio n line of east and west: and side side are 100 buried north and south thus forming two sides of a quadrang. and in these unvaried figures in multudes they lie over the areas of this plantation. Are these facts not peculiar and distinctive? You behold no evidence on the surface to warn you that below are a whole nation of men who sleep undisturbed under the trampling of the furious war horse or the roaming beasts. But downward we search, and soon we find them, hands folded over the breast, the stalwart herces of ages back in the dawn ing of time. Know you any nation unchristian, thus enwrapped, lying down to the "sleep that knows no wrking?" But more marvel, the graves are laid in system. Christian-in long ectangles east and west. Hear you of any nation who so do? Are they not certainly imbued with the spirit of Christian tradition burying to the cast? Associate with this the rising of the star in the cast, the planting of our corner stone to the cast, the wise men of the east and the general tendency of Christian burial. But may they not be merely Indians? It is not shown in the skulls, though those people bury thus (why, we do not now ask) or, were shown in this site akin to the elevated tribes that once adorned Mexico? Both of these conjectures drawn from the position of their bodies, are made improbable by the simple position of the hands folded upon the shringe from which the divinity has fled. For so they tell to us in unmistakable tokens their last undying hope that looking forward to the day when divinity shall return and this mortal shall put on mmortality. But whence came this hope? Certainly they are older than any face knows. The most remote of prehistoric races are a mixture of rudeness and paganism compared with these. If descendants of these lately found friends, they (the Mound builders-Mexicans) are so remote the lapse of time so great that the early purity and definite faith have been lowered and weakened, if not lost, in incongruous myths and superstitions. Besides, if they were contemporary with known races, where are the evidences of intercourse always found in early nomadic trices. Could science have overlooked such if they existed? These facts and reflections bring before us a people that must have lived prior to any prehistoric tribes yet heard They are imbued with the spirit of Christian belief, they evince customs at least coincident with Jewish rites and the enlightenment of revela-

Who are these strangers? and whence learned they this wisdom? Can they be kin to the magnificent Solomon, and were their burying grounds planned from the court of the great temple? What can we learn of them? How came they here? and can they at last establish it in our minds that the old world peopled the new and that God hath made of one blood all nations of men. If I do not weary you I can name one statement that they make to us from their dreary homes. It was learned
