Considering the kinds of memory, M. Menard states that some persons best remember impression received through the eyes; others, those coming through the ears; and still other persons, best keep in mind what they have written out. We are all more or less endowed with auditive and visual memory, while the former is specially developed in musicians and the latter in painters. The three classes-visual, auditive and motor-are illustrated in the methods of study by children, some of whom learn their legsons by reading a number of times, others by only hearing them recited, and still others must repeat the lessons to themselves. Fupils who must recite to themselves in a high voice have auditive-motor memory, while those who must copy the lesson a number of times have visual-motor mem-ory. The student adopts instinctively the methods his memory requires.

Most diseases of trees are due to fungt, which attack roots or trunk, and sometimes branches or leaves. The older the tree the more liable it is to be attacked, while wounds open the way for infection. M. Schrenck, a French forester, has been studying these fung-ous diseases and their remedies, and has learned many important facts. The forcing of anticeptic saits into railway ties, which are being destroyed by fun-gi in great numbers, is the best method of preservation yet known.

A TOMBSTONE WITH A ROMANCE.

The simple tombstone herewith depicted is at Camden, S. C. It is time worn and moss covered, and the inscription, now almost obliterated, records the fact that the remains of a certain Agnes of Glasgow rest there.

The stone was placed there by Lord Cornwallis 184 years ago. According to the legend, Agnes, a bonnie maid of Glasgow, was the affianced sweetheart
