To be brief, the natural consequences will be that we will have to subdivide again, and instead of two jubilees in Sanpete we we will be forced to have four or more, to find room within our largest halls. As it is now, they are crowded very uncomfortably, some classes being on the floor and some in the galleries—some in one end and some in the opposite end of the house—far apart and therefore often not heard or understood by each other or the audience in attendance. Sufficated with heat and tired from

and others that can have the benefit of all this in their own town and with Comfort and ease.

The scenes in the open space that surrounds the Tabernacle would have reminded one of for there—without any shade whatever, except the cover of their wagons—were several hundred people from other estilements consuming their dinners, that they had brought with them, in the scorching sun of the leth of July.

After resting (*) an hour and a half in this way, the tabernacle programme was again proceeded with, and all parts well rendered, but it was plain to be seen that one general desire possessed the audience, and it increased as the house grew warmer and the pupils more tired, till the closing remarks and
