EVENING NEWS.

Thursday, November 18, 1875.

TWO MIGHTY WRESTLERS.

The Greco-Roman Science [at Wrestling.

Andre Christol and William Miller wrestled again on the stage of the Grand Opera House, last evening, after the fashion called Greco-Roman. The place was, on the occasion of their previous contest, crowded to the utmost with spectators of a better class than commonly attend athletic exhibitions. They numbered about 3,000. In this kind of wrestling no tripping is allowed, and a fair fall requires both shoulders of the thrown man to simultaneously touch the floor. The brawny wrestlers, bare to their waists, went on to the stage at 8:30 o'clock, accompanied by Fred J. Engelhardt as referee, and James O'Neil and Emil Regnear as judges respectively for Miller and Christol. Miller, the larger, and Christol the lither, but about equal in perfection of muscular development, had not changed in appearance since their last match, of which Miller was the winner.

The athletes went at each other with head lowered, like wild beasts warily beginning an encounter, and grappled each other firmly around the shoulders, their hands striking the flesh with spiteful slaps. An instant later they were sprawling on their knees, still interlocked with their straining arms. Then they got back to their feet, without relinquishing their holds, and fought like boxers for advantageous grasps. Suddenly Miller loosed his arms, and forced Christol to the floor, the head of the Frenchman striking with a thud. The spectators, before that silent in the intensity of interest, laughed and applauded loudly, but at once became still and keenly observant when Christol nimbly regained a standing posture, and the contest was renewed vigorously. The athletes wrenched, pulled, writhed, and incidentally got into postures worthy of picturing, throughout a hard and long struggle. The violence of the exertions soon brought out sweat profusely, and their muscular, reddened bodies shone in the strong glare of footlights. Their wet skins became so slippery that a grip could not be retained, clasped hands or interlaced fingers not being allowed, and they were compelled to stop and be dried with towels.

The interval was brief, however, and they fell to work again with redoubled activity. The little Frenchman seemingly endeavored to bewilder his more solid antagonist by quick, erratic movements, but his efforts were coolly resisted. Once he got his opponent's head under his arm, and tugged and wrenched at it as though trying to break it off, but the bull-like neck was unyielding. They fell often, but without the shoulders of either touching the floor in the way required for a fall. Once Christol, standing with his face to the back of Miller threw his arms around his middle lifting him high in spite of his struggling, and threw the heavy, resisting bulk over his head. Miller struck the floor heavily on his back, but lifted his shoulders so that they did not touch. Christol whirled quickly, and was in an instant on the prostrate form, endeavoring vainly to force it flat. A little later, in a rapid interchange of crushing hugs, Miller struck Christol a violent blow on the side of the face. Christol staggered and drew back. The spectators shouted excitedly, and some of them hissed.

"Nothing unfair has occurred," [illegible] Engelhardt; "it was an accident."

The round had then lasted half an hour, and the wrestlers were breathing heavily, affected by their tiring exertion. They continued with unslackened activity, however, expending their strength in writhing grapples. The next break was when, in a reckless encounter, Miller's head struck Christol hard and square in the face, hurting him severely, it was evident. Christol complained to the referee, but Miller said that he had not intended any harm. None of the rounds in their previous match had lasted more than twenty minutes, but this was protracted for two hours and a half. Toward the end it became tedious, to be excitingly enlivened again by a scrambling struggle on the floor, each trying to roll the other on his back. Miller came out of this encounter with a bloody mark on his back, the result of a scratch. Throughout, Miller was defensive, apparently relying on his superior strength and endurance, and Christol was offensive, seemingly striving to win by skill and quickness. The judges kept close to them, like seconds in a prize-fight, watching to detect "fouls." The referee several times commanded the loosing of clasped hands, but there were no other violations of the rules.

At the end of an hour neither was advantaged, and they had spent the last fifteen minutes in stubbornly adhering to their different plans of contest. Miller had steadily refused to be aggressive, and had stolidly allowed Christol to make all the onslaughts. And that sort of work continued. Christol repeatedly stood still, with his arms uplifted, inviting Miller to make a choice of holds, but Miller would not be enticed from the defensive. This conduct, added to the usual popular sympathy for the smaller man in any contest, won vigorous applause for Christol and a few uncomplimentary comments upon Miller. Falls became rare and the struggle monotonous. The spectators were patient for an hour and a half, and then a single hiss set going a tumult of disapproval. The hissing was interspersed with shouted criticisms of Miller and encouragement to Christol; the latter being incited to increased endeavor, but the former continuing obdurate, repelling his antagonist's onslaughts, but making none. Christol tried feints, sudden assaults, violent tugs to bend the stubborn neck, and various devices in wrenching in rapid succession, but they were all successfully resisted.

At the close of the second hour, however, Miller's method had not fatigued his antagonist more than it had himself, and he had become so unpopular with the spectators that they hissed him almost continuously. In the midst of the confusion, when the round had lasted over two hours, Christol, with a sudden and desperate expenditure of strength, repeated the feat of throwing his adversary over his head. Miller struck on his back, and it was generally supposed that it was a fall. The house was instantly filled with an uproar of applause, and Christol, bowing, retired from the stage.

Miller remained, and his judge, Mr. O'Neil, denied that the fall was fair. Referee Engelhardt advanced to the footlights and said—"A fall is claimed and disputed. I am only positive that I saw a head and one shoulder on the floor. I decide that it was not a fall."

The decision was not approved by the verdict of the assembly; but Christol readily returned to the stage, and smilingly renewed the contest. He was surprisingly nimble, too, after his long exertion. He dropped on his hands and knees temptingly in front of Miller, and in other ways solicited an assault. At length he darted to Miller, caught him quickly up in his arms, dropped him on the floor and was on him in an instant, crowding him down flat with irresistible force. There could be no doubt about the fairness of this fall, and the cheering was tremendous. There was an interval before the referee's decision could be audibly given.

The wrestlers were taken into the stage dressing-rooms, thoroughly rubbed, wrapped in overcoats and allowed to rest for fifteen minutes. In the time of resting they showed fatigue more than they had while wrestling.

The referee's call for the second round was made at 11:30 o'clock, and enthusiastic applause greeted the reappearance of the men. Christol had lost none of the vivacity of his manner, and bowed like a circus performer. Miller seemed to be in much the worse condition. The skin of each arm had been broken by the rough usage, and the blood had oozed out, leaving red marks on the inflamed surface. The round began and continued in a lively manner. Miller abandoned his inert scheme and exerted himself aggressively. It was an unremitting tussle, now with the wrestlers grappled face to face, now wriggling on the floor, and now flinging each other down with furious force. The excited assembly left but small spaces between their outbursts of shouting and applause, and apparently forgot Miller's previous unentertaining behavior in admiring his present active exertion. Christol clung again and again to Miller's neck, bending him down with all his strength, and as often was rudely forced off by violent effort. The culmination was a rough struggle on the floor, each trying to roll the other on his back. Their breathing was so labored that it could be heard in the furthest part of the theatre in the short spells of silence, and the referee and judges bent over them to watch for the result. It came in the defeat of Christol, who, writhe how he would, could not keep his shoulders above the floor. The round lasted only thirteen minutes, and left a fall apiece. —N. Y. Sun, Nov. 10.

Rocky Mountain Pills.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE,

From New and Rare Medicinal Plants recently discovered in the Rocky Mountains!

PURELY VEGETABLE.

FIFTEEN years of earnest botanical research among these mountains and valleys have resulted in the discovery, not only of many new varieties of plants, but of new species, some of which have wonderful medicinal curative properties. By continued experiment their virtues have become known—and thus from extracts of these newly discovered plants are these pills compounded.

If properly used, they will cure very many diseases, pains and aches, and are more especially valuable in DYSPEPSIA, LIVER COMPLAINTS, INDIGESTION, JAUNDICE, and all cases of FEVERS, COLDS, URINARY AND KIDNEY DISEASES, RHEUMATISM, COSTIVENESS, HEARTBURN, DIARRHŒA, MUMPS, MEASLES, for PURIFYING THE BLOOD, and for many other diseases, and all cases of BILIOUSNESS and DISORDERED STOMACH.

On orders accompanied by the cash or postal order, I will send safely by mail, postpaid, 1 box Pills for 25 cents; 1 dozen boxes, $2.50; 1 gross boxes, $24.00.
