

GENERAL GRANT DEAD.

The fatal hour has come! The event which so many millions of people have looked forward to with anticipation for months has occurred. The nation's hero has fallen. The nation's hero has fallen. The nation's hero has fallen.

General Grant, whose throes of pain during months of suffering have called forth responsive sympathy from millions of hearts, has found that relief from his agony which human skill failed to afford him. The power of an iron will and the unusual bodily strength and endurance with which he was favored, no longer avail him in resisting the demand made for his mortal life.

This "mighty leveler" has again exhibited his power in laying low one of earth's great ones. The spirit of General Grant took its flight at eight minutes past eight o'clock this morning, and now lies at rest.

In 1850 there was an effort made to renominate him for the office of President, but the objection throughout the nation to having anyone serve a third term in the office was too powerful to admit of his being elected.

His subsequent failure in financial matters and unfortunate connection with a colossal swindling operation in the minds of our readers, though they may have been somewhat obscured by the sympathy which has been universally felt for his sufferings, and the handsome manner in which the last Congress came to his relief in placing him upon the retired list with a pension of $20,000 a year.

In the year 1851 he was sent to Oregon with a detachment of the regular army, and two years subsequently he resigned his commission and returned to the States, where he married and settled down to a quiet life near St. Louis.

When the war broke out in 1861, he raised a company of volunteers and offered his services to Governor Yates, of Illinois, to aid in the suppression of the rebellion.

None of his acquaintances at that time supposed that he would develop any great capacity for military leadership, and it is doubtful whether he himself even imagined so.

He was the first to enter the war, and he was the first to leave it. He was the first to enter the war, and he was the first to leave it.

It was on the occasion of Fort Donelson being taken that his character as a warrior was first shown up in great plainness.

The estimate which President Lincoln placed upon General Grant is illustrated by the following, which is given by one of his secretaries as his language:

all wanted me to be the General. Now I don't want to be. I don't want to be. I don't want to be.

The battles of the next year, which had for their object the capture of Richmond, the headquarters of the Confederates, were the bloodiest of the whole war.

The rebellion was quelled, comparatively peace was restored, and General Grant became the hero of the day.

In civil affairs General Grant was not conspicuous for greatness, and but little can be said in favor of his administration.

Nor was this admiration confined to this nation, for after his retirement from the office of President when he made a tour of the civilized world, he was received everywhere with an ovation and feted and honored as one of the greatest among men.

His subsequent failure in financial matters and unfortunate connection with a colossal swindling operation in the minds of our readers, though they may have been somewhat obscured by the sympathy which has been universally felt for his sufferings, and the handsome manner in which the last Congress came to his relief in placing him upon the retired list with a pension of $20,000 a year.

"Grant is the first General I've had. He's a General. . . . You know how it has been with all the rest. As soon as a man gets to be a General, he's a General. . . .

somewhat removed from the family circle, Henry, the nurse and Harrison Turrell, the General's body servant, were respectfully watching the closing life of the great man.

The General's little grand children, U. S. Grant, Jr., and Nellie, were sleeping in the nursery.
