GUINEA FOWLS ON THE FARM.

Guineas, though not so profitable as hens on the farm, will pay very well when cared for in the right way. When kept confined they will not pay for their keeping; being naturally very shy, they dislike to come in contact with people as much as is necessary. One can to a certain extent overcome the wild disposition by proper training, but the work must be begun early. The best way is to place part of a setting of guinea eggs under an ordinary hen, and when she has been sitting a week place a few hen's eggs among them. As the guineas require four weeks of incubation and the others only three weeks, all will thus hatch to-

Guineas being so wild, the first impulse of the young chicks is to run away from the hen, but by bringing them up with chickens which mind the hen from the start, they quickly learn to do the same, and such a flock can often be cared for almost exactly like other fowls. By feeding them in or near the hen house every night, they can often be induced to come there to roost with the other fowls. They can seldom be induced to lay in the nest provided for them, but prefer to hide their eggs among weeds or brush, where it is almost impossible to find them. As, however, they are such noisy creatures, one can discover the nest by watching closely. Besides this advantage, the noise of the fowls is a great help in keeping hawks away from the premises; the latter eldom make trouble where guineas are kept. Their nest is usually a small rather deep hole in the ground, and a nest will sometimes be found full to overflowing with the small brownish

Guineas, unlike hens, do almost no damage in the garden, their principal food being grains, bugs and worms They do not scratch, not being intended by nature for that work, but are more like a bird, being provided with strong wings which will carry them over any chicken fence that can be

The eggs are very rich, and are considered by many cooks better than hen's eggs, having a greater propor-tion of yolk. The flesh of the guinea is also beginning to be better appreciated many people preferring it to wild game Where a few years ago no market could be found for guinea fowls, the demand ply. Cooked like wild game, it resembles some kinds so closely that none but experts can tell the difference. Those who dislike the wild flavor of the meat can parboil it with a little raw corrot in the water, which will remove most of the strong taste, and the fowl can then be cooked like a chicken.—Country Gentleman.

A LITTLE FARM OUTSIDE OF TOWN

After becoming tired of working fifteen years at the carpenter trade in in Denver I concluded to move my family into the coutry and take up ranching on the side in a small way. I have 200 hens which are now laying one hundred and fifty eggs a day. These are readily converted into cash at twenty-five cents a dozen to city people or others. This brings about $90 a month. In winter I do not get so many eggs, but I am paid thirty or forty cents a dozen for them. I usually hatch one thousand eggs a season including goose and duck eggs. This generally gives 600 or 900 head all told. I sell off the young roosters when they weigh about two pounds as brollers at $1 sell about two hundred head of before summer is over, making $100. Ducks and geese are not so much demanded by the Denver trade but when I can sell young ducks at fif-teen cents a pound it is a good deal velvet because they grow twice as rapidly as chickens, pick up much
