THE EVENING NEWS.

BASHFUL BOOTS

[CONCLUDED.]

My arms were around her immediately, in spite of the spectators. "You knew me—," I cried; "you return my love—oh! merciful father! what happiness!"

She looked up at me timidly.

"Yes, I knew you," she replied softly. "I have seen you watching my window some nights. I wanted to warn you against the Prince, but I never had a chance. I knew your life was in danger ——" and she broke down again.

The next morning found me an early visitor at the Palazza Goldona, for, as the reader may suppose, I did not leave Rome by the midnight train. My mistress met me, all smiles and blushes.

"In love with Prince Borgia," she cried indignantly, when I confessed my jealousy." I am too thoroughly an American ever to have married any foreigner, least of all Prince Borgia. For weeks I have done everything short of rudeness to get rid of him. His mother, before he came to Rome, was very kind to me, and I could not, for her sake, treat him as I otherwise should. Ever since that day on the Campagna, or rather the day after, when I saw his manner toward you, I have dreaded some such attempt as this, for I knew his jealous, vindictive nature."

"It was just that anxiety I misinterpreted," I cried. "It made me sure that you loved him. I thought it was for him you were anxious."

She laughed lightly. "You ought to have a better opinion of yourself. I declare!" she added suddenly, starting from my side, "I do believe it was I that proposed after all. Fie on you! 'Faint heart never won fair lady,' sir."

But I drew her again to me, and kissed her, and she nestled on my bosom, blushing and happy, and forgiving me. At last she glanced up, shyly.

"But I have a confession to make," she said. "You won't be angry?"

"Certainly not. How could I?"

"Promise."

"I promise."

"It is something you ought to know before I become your wife. Perhaps—perhaps—perhaps it may make you change your mind."

She hid her face on my bosom again.

"Nothing can make me change my mind."

"Not if I tell you," and she spoke in a voice so low I could hardly hear her, "that I was—in love—before?"

I started. Her hesitation, her whole manner sent a sudden chill through me. Was it but the ashes of a heart, then, that I had won?

"You promised," she said hurriedly, "not to be angry. And it may make a difference if I tell you it was a long time ago."

"Ah!" I cried, forcing a smile, but no words can describe my torture.

"But—but—" she resumed, "I kept on loving him. Nay! don't start—forgive me. It was a sort of youthful dream, you see. He was my ideal of everything great and noble — my Bayard, my Sydney, my Sir Lancelot."

I winced more and more. What was the rack to this?

"But, darling," (she had never stopped, but went on, hurriedly), "it is you I love now—remember that! Only I must tell you all. I worshipped my youthful fancy till — till the day on the Campagna. And now I have something to return to him—not exactly a lovetoken, but what I have kept as a memento ——"

"And you wish me to write to him, and send this—this memento?" I interrupted curtly, and quite withdrawing from her. I came very near saying, "Never."

"If you please," she answered demurely, rising and courtesying. As she spoke, she drew from her pocket a small, faded bit of paper, that had apparently been torn from a memorandum book, and a thin, worn, gold pencil-case.

For an instant I was dumb with amazement. I looked at the pencil-case and then at her merry face, which was now rippling all over with fun. Like a flash everything came back to me; the wild, wooded hills; the stone farmhouse; the lush grasses; the water-cresses; I saw the shy, bashful child, with her milk-pitcher. I recognized the face, too, at last, in the one before me. "How could I fail to recognize it before?" I said to myself, half angrily. All my jealousy was gone in an instant. For it was I who had been her ideal through all these years; it was I who had been her Bayard, her Sydney, her Sir Lancelot!

I gazed like one transfixed, stammering:

"And you are——"

"Bashful Boots," with another courtesy, and so roguish a look, "or Bathful Booth, as I believe I said in those days."

Then she told me how it all came about. She had given my memorandum to her uncle, who began immediately to look for ore, and was happily rewarded by finding a vein. He was soon a rich man.

"We all shared in the good fortune," said my mistress. "My cousin and I were sent to the Moravian school at Bethlehem, and my uncle's two sons went to college. We often thought and spoke of you as our benefactor," she said, nestling close to me, "and even inquired after you in the city, but found you had gone abroad."

"Three years ago, she continued, "a terrible calamity befel us. My uncle's health failed, and he was ordered to New Orleans for the winter. The family all went, except myself, for I remained at Bethlehem in order to perfect myself in my studies. There was an explosion," she shuddered all over, "you may have heard of it—and were all lost, father, mother, sons, and daughter."

"It was in that way," she resumed, after a while, "that I came by the name of Vonberg. It was my uncle's (he was my mother's brother), and I was to take it, with the property, till I married; for my uncle, strange to say, as if by a presentiment, had made a will for this very contingency."

"That is why I never recognized you," said I. "The name threw me off the track completely."

"That won't do, sir," she said, "for I recognized you at once. I knew you the first day when I saw you at St. Peter's. But a woman is always the most faithful."

Prince Borgia left Rome that morning for an indefinite period, as was given out. His sudden flight confirmed our belief that he had hired a bravo to assassinate me.

Some one is looking over my shoulder as I write. "It is a shame to tell all that nonsense about your wife," she says. "People will say I made love to you."

But I answered with a kiss, which brings blushes to her cheek, for, though she has been married for six years, she is still my "Bashful Boots."
