and a standard of its supposed perfec. tion is established for its perpetuation and future guide for breeding. I say supposed perfection, because as years pass special characteristics become very pronounced, and it becomes nec-essary to change or modify the stand-ard. Here it is interesting to note that ard. Here it is increasing to note that it is the shape of the fowls that makes the breed, while the color designates the variety. Thus we find quite a num-ber of varieties of one breed, as the white, buff, barred, and a new variety called partridge Plymouth Rocks. This loss named variety conforming in shape called partridge Plymouth Rocks. This last named variety conforming in shape to the Rocks, but having the markings of the Partridge Cochin. and being minus the feathers on the legs, and while this ever increasing of varieties goes on, those interested in poultry, who make a careful study of the sub-ject can go through a poultry show and pick out all the different breeds and varieties, and point out to the unob-serving the differences in their make-up, and it is surprising to see with varieties, and point out to the unoo-serving the differences in their mako-up, and it is surprising to see with what accuracy a good judge can take a fowl and score card in his hands and soing over it section by section, mark-ing the number of points the bird is de-ficient in each section, he gives the ex-hibitor a scored card, which shows how nearly the bird is to the standard adopted as the perfect bird, and if call-ed upon to score the bird again will do the scoring exactly as he did in the first instance. Thus in the show room the winners are determined, and the prizes awarded accordingly. Now as to who gets the benefits of all this work. First the originator of a breed, be-cause from his poultry yards there goes out to those who are attracted to this varlety of fowls the originator's first sales; and according to the merits of the breed whether for fancy or utility the prices are generally low or high. Another thing that regulates the price is the nearness with which the fowls approach to the standard of their ideal the prices are generally low or high. Another thing that regulates the price is the nearness with which the fowls approach to the standard of their ideal perfection. Now the contest begins for ideal fowls, and the breeder who comes nearest to the ideal gets the run of the business. He is able to get higher prices for stock or eggs for hatching. But this does not always follow. Some people build their reputation as breeders upon the ability of some one else. They either buy their fowls for exhibiting at the poultry shows or buy eggs and raise them, thus the real breeder gets no credit, while the person holding the prize winners gets the trade or at least the bast of it. This is as it should be. Any one who will keep the best whether able to breed the stock to that degree, or whether he is able to buy it, he has it for the benefit of himself first, and other people secondly. If he has in his possession and maintains the best goods he certainly is entitled to the best trade, and if I go to that party for some of his stock, I will display very bad judgment if I offer to exchange some of his good ones. Now if the breed-er does not understand his stock, and makes such mating as proves unsatis-factory to his customers he will soon makes such mating as proves unsatis-factory to his customers he will soon gain a reputation for unfair dealing, and lose his hold upon his trade, or at least the trade he might have practi-cally controlled.

But more about this breeding question and unfair dealing will come later. D. D.
