A Life of Crime PLEA FOR JUVENILE COURT SYSTEM by Gov. John C. Cutler

Almost half a century ago a 10-yearold boy named Alexander McKay lived in the city of Kingston, Canada. He was probably no worse than the average boy of that age; inclined, perhaps, to be mischlevous and to disregard the rights and the dignity of others, as all boys are in greater or less degree.

In the course of some of his boyish pranks, he committed an offense which could technically be construed into a crime-a felony. And unfortunately there was a judge at hand who was only too willing to place the extreme construction on the boy's act. He was brought before this severe magistrate, Judge Duggan, and after due trial and conviction was sentenced to four years to the state mixer among many ⁹⁰⁰ in the state prison, among nearly 200 of the most hardened criminals known to that section of the country. This four-year term was a most effectual apprenticeship in crime. What-ever criminal tendencies the boy may have previously possessed were con-firmed and enlarged by his enforced asfirmed and enlarged by his enforced as-sociation. Every trick of the trade, every means of committing crime and eluding pursuit, every device known to the habitual criminal was rehearsed and enlarged upon in his hearing. The indescribable, incomprehensible fascina-tion of a criminal career was present-ed in all its varied phases. By the time his term had ended the boy, now just entering upon the period of pub-erty, had made up his mind to be a professional crook. The judgment pro-nounced by the bigoted magistrate might well have been. "I sentence you to a life of crime;" for that was its effect.

Better

In the course of the conversation he was asked if throughout his career at any time, he had come to the conclu-sion that it would pay him better to work for a living than to continue in a life of crime. He said he had come to that conclusion a few months before committing the crime for which he was last sentenced. At that time he had secured a position at good wages, and was doing well. But the exposure and hardships forced upon him by his way of life had brought on an attack of muscular rheumatism; and he was compelled to quit work and take treat-ment at the Hot Springs, near Ogden. While thus engaged he met two of his former companions, who told him how easy it would be to commit a certain burglary and get in a single night enough money to pay for a complete course of treatment. He was tempted by the fact that the brief treatment already taken had greatly benefited him; and he thought it would be pos-sible in a few months more to effect a complete cure. The burglary was attempted. It failed. The two men who were most guilty, and who incited to crime the old man who was trying to reform, es-caned. The man himself, crippied In the course of the conversation he old man who was trying to reform, es-caped. The man himself, crippled and weak, was unable to flee, and was and weak, was unable to flee, and was captured. His guilt was apparent, and he was convicted and sentenced as above stated. His attempt at re-formation came too late. The school-ing in crime forced upon him by an unjust, indiscreet judge, had made re-form well nigh impossible. His ca-reer of crime might have been prevent-ed; but in his old age it could not be stopped. The time to save him was at ten years of age, not at fifty-nine. I speak of this case thus at iengin, for the reason that it illustrates better thain any other that has come under for the reason that it illustrates better thain any other that has come under my observation, the value of the juven-lie court as a preventative of crime. No boy at 10 years of age can be really guility of a felony. It is impossible. His moral responsibility is not great enough. But if even he could be, he should not be placed under the en-forced association and influence of hardened criminals. It is the surest way to place him beyond the power of reformation. It is the one inevitable way to make him an outlaw and an outcast. outcast.

The other method-detention under morol influences, instruction in useful and elevating pursuits, the opportunity morol influences. Instruction in useful and elevating pursuits, the opportunity of mastering a trade and securing em-ployment, and above all, the impres-sion made upon him that he is a future clizen, not a coming criminal—is the best way to save the boy and make a man of him. And we are to be con-gratulated on the fact that we have our choice between the two methods of dealing with delinquent children. The juvenile court system is a means, and I think the only means, of prevent-ing such tragedies. The law on this subject, passed by the recent legisla-ture, definitely prohibits the placing of children in jails or lockups, and pro-vides that when declared delinquent they shall be assigned to the care of probation officers, who are to look after their associations and attempt to lead them away from evil into the paths of peace. If they have any desire what-ever to lead lives of usefulness, they are encouraged and assisted; and best of all, the means of doing so are pro-vided. If they do fall into evil ways, it is due to their own instincts and not to enforced association. The case of Alexander McKay is a comonstration of the necessity of juv-nile courts. -JOHN C. CUTLER.

STORY OF BURNED STORE

Harold Allington Tells How He Accidentally Set His Bed Covers on Fire.

Harold Allington, the youth who told a tale of being attacked by robbers, shot at and then beaten insensible at the Westwood grocery store when that place was burned to the ground last Monday night, has finally confessed that the story he told was false; that there were no robbers; that he was not beaten, and that he set fire to the store by accident. Detectives Shannon and Wilson have been working on the case since young Allington was taken into custody. He stuck to the story he first told with great persistency. He even gave a written account as he first told the tale and insisted that he had told the

of his criminal career, is a skilled workman and a man of more than average intelligence, has spent in prison 42 years of a lifetime of 53. The state has not only lost the work he might have done and the values he might have created, but it has been put to the expense of providing him food and shelter and warmth and clothing in his enforced idleness. To this expense may be added the still greater outlay of his numerous ar-rests and trials, and of guarding him in the different prisons where his terms have been served, as well as the terms have been served, as well as th terms have been served, as well as the loss citizens have sustained through bis thefts and burglarles. This is the financial loss. In ad-dition, the state has lost a citizen, a husband, and a father; and has ex-changed a doer of good deeds for a worker of evil. And finally, unless the infinite mercy of God intervenes. there has been lost an immortal soul. This man, standing now near the verge of the grave (for his un-natural life has broken him down, and at the age of 59 he is an old man and a physical wreck) looks back on a life worse than wasted, and forward to a dark and hopeless future.

If the sys-tem of jurisprudence prevailing in that town allowed the judge no dis-cretion in the punishment of this boy, then the system is at fault. If it allowed discretion and the judge refused to exercise it, he is the guilty man. The boy is the helpless vic-tim, more to be pitied than blamed. written account as he first told the tale and insisted that he had told the truth even when confronted with facts that proved his statement to be false. But last night about 3 o'clock, he sent for Detective Shannon. When the latter entered the jak, young Allington said: "Mr. Shannon, you are right, I set fire to the store by accident." The youth then explained that when he went to bed he placed an electric light globe under the covers and that in some way, after falling to sleep, he broke the globe and the hot wires set fire to the bed. In this way his right ankle was blistered. He was awak-ened by the flames and tried to stamp them out but found that he could not do so, because of the ol on the floor, When he ran from the burning build-ing he struck his head against some-thing, causing the mark which he claimed was inflicted by robbers.
