EVENING NEWS.

Friday, - October 20, 1876.

The British Eighty-One Ton Gun.

A SEVENTEEN HUNDRED POUND SHOT HURLED SEVEN MILES.

Guns, great and small, are fired every day over the sands, from this solitary and remote corner of Essex, and the inhabitants of its little town and garrison are so accustomed to loud and sudden noises as scarcely to notice sounds which would torture the untrained ear; but to-day has been a day of dread, and its population, to the last man, woman and child, has been all day in a state of nervous excitement and apprehension as to the possibilities attending the discharge of such an unwonted monster as the eighty-one ton gun, with its 370 pounds of powder, and its three quarters of a ton shot. There was really some ground for alarm, because the gun does not stand with the rest of the guns at this school of gunnery, but is placed on the beach close to the barracks and its contiguous thoroughfares, and barely fifty yards in front of a rather extensive block of soldier's cottages; and no one could say what effect the concussion might have upon adjacent buildings, while some of the more timid began to speculate even on the contingency of the gun bursting and scattering its fragments like hail upon the devoted colony. The breaking of windows and crockery had been a foregone conclusion, and, yesterday, a Sergeant's party went round proclaiming, with the sound of the trumpet at the street corners, that from 10 o'clock till 5, to-day, to-morrow, and Friday, people who were wise would leave their windows and doors open, as some sort of precaution against the expected disturbance of the atmosphere by violent explosions. The inhabitants were given to understand likewise that if, notwithstanding their caution and care, damage should be done it would be made good out of the public funds, but these warnings and promises did not tend to allay the popular disquiet and apprehension. It certainly appeared as if all the inhabitants were out of doors; some of the shop-keepers, as an extra precaution, shut up their shops entirely, and everybody seemed to be drawn to the spot where the terrible giant lay. There were not many strangers present, for Shoeburyness is far removed from populous places, and difficult of access, the nearest railway station being that at Southend, four or five miles distant. The officials in attendance were those who who have been associated with the gun in its earlier trials.

The trials were to have begun at 10 o'clock, but it was two hours later before the order was given to make ready. The loading apparatus worked admirably under the control of about a dozen artillerymen, and the time required to run the shot and cartridge down from the magazine, and to ram both home down the muzzle of the gun was barely five minutes. The loading carriage and derrick were then drawn under the chase or barrel of the gun, the fire-buffers of the gun carriage having been removed in order to gain more space, the electric tube was inserted, and the bugle sounded to prepare for action. The extremely cautious betook themselves to safe distances, every one gave the gun a wide berth, and most of the spectators gazed out seaward, in the hope of catching sight of the wonderful projectile in its flight. The gun, through an alteration in the programme, was laid at an angle of seven degrees, by which the muzzle was to some extent elevated, and about 6,000 yards away a range party, consisting of half a dozen gunners in a wagon and two mounted sergeants in charge, were posted to keep observations, and signal by flags to the firing point. An admiralty tug was said to be engaged in warning intruders from the dangerous ground, but she was not to be discerned among the many vessels which crowded the horizon, and contributed something of hazard to the day's experiments. There was no target to take aim at, but a straight range had been pegged out for about four miles, and the tramping of horsemen had made the path of the shot very legible for some distance. The bugle sounded the order to fire, an officer in the instrument room touched a stud, the crash came, and then the 1,700 shot was clearly seen cleaving its way through the air to an altitude of apparently several hundred yards, then descending and diminishing until lost to view, until, after what seemed a long interval, it struck the earth, throwing up a volcano of mud and water and bounding on again, to fall and bury itself with another splash far beyond. It was afterward reported that the shot made its first contact at a distance of 4,687 yards, and that the ricochet carried it about as far again. The next consideration was the gun, and how had the carriage withstood the unaccustomed strain consequent on the higher elevation. Both gun and carriage were in perfect condition, and then came a question as to what had been the consequences of the atmospheric disturbance. An officer went round to take an inventory of the damages, and the soldiers' wives came about him with dismal records of broken windows and shattered ceilings. Most of the cottages along the sea front had one or two broken panes of glass, several had their rooms littered with plaster from the walls and ceilings, and one or two had their window-sashes blown completely out; but the most remarkable effects were manifested at a greater distance. The plate-glass windows of Mr. Cause, grocer, opposite Mr. Kirkwood's canteen, fully 500 yards from the gun, was utterly destroyed, and the glass, a quarter of an inch thick, scattered about the road. The barrack gate was burst open and its lock broken, several sashes had vanished, and there were broken windows in every street. Each subsequent round added something to the damage, but the greatest mischief was necessarily done at the first discharge. Four other rounds were fired at the same elevation, namely, seven degrees, and each shot fell within a few feet of the same distance, two appearing to bury themselves at once, and the other two bounding after No. 1, into the German Ocean. The gun was then depressed to an angle of only one degree, and two shots were sent skimming over the water, making "ducks and drakes" several times before they disappeared. The second was observed splashing up foam at a distance of 11,500 yards, or nearly seven miles from the shore, and as the "twist" in the projectile gave it a constant tendency to the right, it seemed to go unpleasantly near to some shadowy looking steamers in the hazy distance. It was consequently somewhat of a relief to a portion of the spectators when the order was given to cease firing for the day.

The gun, carriage, and all the arrangements for the firing stood the test well, the only defect being a slight depression in the recoil line after the fourth round; but this proved of no disadvantage.—London News.
