OF IRELAND.

THE wrongs of Ireland have formed a subject for the bard, the orator, the journalist and the statesman for many a year. The sons of Erin are in a very unfortunate condition on the soil of their fathers. Away from the "ould sod" and especially on this great continent, most of them by mingling with other elements of humanity develop into useful, powerful and valuable constituents of the social and political body. But at home they are in a chronic state of unrest. Too turbulent, aggressive and mercurial to be entrusted with self-government so near to the Power that has long held them in subjection, and the patriotic, independent, brittle and unsubmissive to yield and fawn upon the hand of the conqueror, they can neither rule in wisdom nor be ruled in peace.

Borrow for their misfortunes is felt wherever the chord of sympathy is strung in the human heart, and a

England will be blamed, of course, for the troubles in Ireland. It is so easy to censure, while it is very difficult to suggest a remedy. Ireland, "cut loose from vals. with England, would be a continual men ace to the nation from which it was severed, and a plotting ground for foreign enemies.
