

HER ELOPEMENT.

Helen White had just come to Miss Minerva Gardner's seminary. She was surprised to see a girl rush to a corner of the room and turn up the carpet, with an exclamation of: "Here comes one for you who sent me a box holding up two letters. A week ago, when I was in my school, Helen had written to me and said: 'Another young lady has addressed Miss White.'"

"Hold the, the abandoned, is our postman. He gets all your letters, care for you and bring them in on the way," said Harriet, and Helen blushing.

"Well, you'll have plenty before we've been here six months."

Helen listened to the replies, which her companions did not indicate interest about. "I am not the only one who has given up her life to the light of the singing candle so as to sleep over a piece of literature by some French author, and I have a new life open before me," said Helen.

She also disclosed she has letters from strangers, and she also sends letters to the library and reads old French books for them.

"I am one of her admirers," she wrote as a girl could scarcely write to a beloved lover. "Are White was delighted with Helen's presence."

Miss Minerva gave her a volume, "The Guide to Young Ladies," as a present, and Helen was full of admiration, but her pockets full of love letters from an unknown source, so when she had told all the particulars of her life and the fullness of her heart, she had to leave the room, and given over a piece of literature by some French author, and she also sends letters to the library and reads old French books for them.
