

Old Love and Burglary.

A few weeks since, the wife of a Sacramento street merchant, whose residence is in Stockton street, a little north of Pacific, San Francisco, was suddenly awakened, late in the night, by footsteps in her bedroom, and the next moment the light of a dark lantern flooded her face so near that she could almost feel the heat and hear the suppressed breathing of the intruder. She was entirely alone. Her husband had gone to Sacramento, two days before, and the only person in the house beside herself was a servant-girl, who slept in the story beneath. She comprehended all. The house had been entered by burglars, who knew of the absence of the husband, and the person who held the lantern was probably armed and prepared to silence the first attempt at alarm with the stroke of a knife or a "billy." Her presence of mind did not forsake her. It doubtless requires resignation and fortitude in a woman to witness, or listen to, without scream or expostulation, the ransacking of her repositories of laces and the appropriation of her jewelry and other valuables; but the lady very rationally deemed her life of more consideration than all the laces and diamonds in the world, and without thinking of what the rascals would help themselves to, or what leave as worthless, she closed her eyes and awaited the result.

The light was withdrawn from her face, and she heard the opening of drawers, the rustling of silks, the picking of locks, and occasionally a low whisper of surprise or disappointment. Then there was silence for a full minute—it seemed an hour to her—and a soft footstep approached the bed, and the glare of the lantern again fell upon her face. Through the closed lids of her eyes she saw the light, but remained calm and motionless in its scrutinizing rays, fearful that the least movement might imperil her life. What a moment of suspense! The light was removed from her face, and she felt that some one was leaning against the bed.—Still she remained motionless—now more through a feeling of terror than the counsel of policy. Nor did she stir when the warm breath of the burglar touched her cheek. Not until his lips pressed her forehead did she spring up and half shriek, "Who is in this room?"

"Hush!" responded a voice in a hoarse whisper, while a rough hand was laid on her shoulder. "Speak nothing, and fear nothing." The next moment she heard the sound of retreating footsteps and the creaking of a shutter, and then all was still again. Satisfied that she was alone, she sprang from the bed, and touching a lighted match to the burred, sank into a chair, completely prostrated with the danger through which she had passed. Recovering, she closed and fastened the window through which the burglar had entered, and then looked around to ascertain of what she had been plundered.

The drawers were in confusion, and almost everything with a lock to it had been opened; but, strange to say, little or nothing was missing. A casket of jewelry was open on the bureau, but the diamonds and the gold were all there, and her watch hung where she had placed it on retiring. Beside the casket she discovered a little roll of paper. She picked it up, and found that it enveloped a hard substance, that that hard substance was a ring, and that that ring had been given to her many years before, and had been in her possession ever since. Half bewildered at the singular proceeding, she was about casting the scrap of paper from her, when her eye caught the marks of a pencil upon it. She carefully opened it and read:

"This ring, which was once mine, tells me in whose house I am. I did not know you were in California. You know I am an outlaw—the world knows it and I do not care to deny it—but fallen as I am, I cannot rob you, Maria. Forgive me, and God bless you!—HENRY."

This explained all. She read the scroll, and dropping upon her knees, prayed for him who had written it. And who was "Henry?"—Ten years ago he loved that same Maria, when they both lived in Brooklyn; and he would have made her his wife—for she told him she would be his—had he not taken to drink and gambling, and finally forged the name of his employer, for which he was given a home in Sing Sing. When he was worthy of her love he gave her that ring, and she had kept it in remembrance of what he had been. This is the story of the ring.

On the return of the husband from Sacramento, the wife related the adventure and showed him the note; but he is not jealous, nor has he attempted to arrest the burglar.
