party now appears to be divided into two sorts of opinions. One class be lieves that there are four republicans in the country still for the party and its principles to elect as president, and who believe that a non-factional candidate would bring back all the re-publicans who have been out of the line, except those who are permanent ly gone on account of the tariff, and who would not return unless a party son, who will have his own State enthusiastically for him if he wants it, who has great strength all over the West and among the business interests of the East, and is without enemies in the party, and has a tariff record like that of Garfield. Among the soldiers there is an effort to direct the popular tide towards Sheridan. This is on the surface just now, but the undertow is strongly towards Gresham, who, different from many soldiers, seems to be strong in that peculiar union and fellowship of such soldiers as are united in the Organized form of the Grand Army and ganized form of the Grand Army and Loyal Legion and who is strong also with some of the elements of dissatisfied republicans in the east, and who is also strong with the anti-monopoly elements of the west. If a soldier is to be chosen, the situation, taking the east and west together, prefigure a SOLDIER LIKE GRESHAM, who is strong in peculiar points, and who is strong in peculiar points, and strong both east and west.

The other class of republicans, and I should say they were greatly in the majority, say that the situation demands a man who, because of his strength with the working people; and on the tariff question, can command more votes than his party now has left. They hold that in such a caudidate the party will have a double assurance of success, and that such a man alone can be sure of carrying New York, surance of success, and that such a man alone can be sure of carrying New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. These people are all for Blaine, and more enthusiastically than ever. So are the reputlicans who favor an emphatic and distinctively American policy in all things. Blaine has lest no friends in the West, but rather gained. In the in the West, but rather gained. In the East, he has gained in Massachusetts, New Jersey and Connecticut, and held his own in New York among the republicans, and materially gained in that State among the democrats and workingmen who are for protection.
