

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF A CITY

AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

"THOSE who never do any more than get paid for any more than they do," So says Elbert Hubbard. And while the point in the following story may prove a little vague, still it hinges, somewhat, on this modern philosopher's statement.

A prosperous young business man in this town, somewhat given to giving small measure unless well paid, and reluctant in giving it even then, was confronted with a little surprise in his own well-appointed home, during the past two weeks. He ought to take it in the light of a lesson, if the light of a moral lesson can penetrate his own private views and notions.

One evening, as George sat reading the newspaper, completely lost in the list of stocks, Mildred, his wife, suddenly flashed before him in all her glory and feathers—her new winter bonnet.

"An inverted coat-busket, for all the world," said George, "George was somewhat given to grumble, also, which usually made allowance for his brutal remarks.

Mildred was a decidedly pretty woman, yet looked anything but attractive—what woman could—in this dark blue 'inverted coat-busket'—sure enough, smothered, in bright green plumes. Add to the incongruousness of the hat the injury and disappointment occasioned by a husband's unkind remarks, and the winter's stay in military has received sufficient blow to render it straight off.

Hats seem to have a deal to do with married bliss—that is, women's hats. They stand for half the battle, with two shining sides. A beautiful hat may be dear to a woman's heart, and doubly dear to a man's pocket-book, but perhaps after all it pays for itself, if only in smiles and well ordered meals, and a good meal goes a long way toward the harmony in the home beautiful, and if a new hat can bring it about, that is, add in bringing it about, why then the hat is cheap at any price.

Mildred was silent after George had so cruelly expressed himself regarding her hat. There was nothing for her to do, really. George was silent, too. He was staring at the probable length of the bill. "How much?" he drawled, finally. Mildred smiled. The battle was on. "Thirty-five dollars," she answered.

"Keep us in coal, for two-thirds of the winter," said George.

Mildred smiled. Discretion being the better part of valor, she kept still.

"I allow so much within reason, as you know, Mildred. So much, and no more. We can't stand it, besides if we could, it is unreasonable."

George's reason, usually fit him close, it was out and measured by his own standard—doing no more than was actually done by him, and not as he'd be done by. While perhaps it was not always his conscious intention of carrying out his narrow standard in his own home, among his own loved ones—for his sake we hope they are loved ones—still, being built the way he is, it creeps in unconsciously, at times, as in the matter of his stock. The baby, Mildred hurried out of the room, George thought naturally that being his own wife, she was sensible; she was silent because there was no disputing his infinite wisdom, and had merely hurried from the room at the cry of the baby upstairs. But if the truth be known, Mildred, choked with tears and indignation, could not resist the temptation to express her feelings, however, and upstairs in the dark, as mother and child wept to each other, were soon dried in the soft arms of a tiny slave. Surely the beautiful mother of a beautiful baby is entitled to a beautiful hat, if father can afford it, which in this case he can; the hat is not too dear for her.

The days went by and Mildred continued the even tenor of her way—her usual, unassuming way—behind which was ever a deal of wisdom and method. George, of course, seeing in return why Mildred should take exception to his cold-blooded speech on her hat, went the even tenor of his way, too. By and by, something seemed to trouble him, though. Not, not conscience, he never knew any trouble from that. True, Mildred's good coat had left her, just why he did not know, yet that should make no difference in the matter. He had never known Mildred to fall in the lack of a good coat; and always equal was she to the shortcomings of the new one, until that one was fully initiated, allowing no inferior dishes to appear, and no shortage in the number of dishes served.

George indulged himself one extravagance—the only one—feasting. No stint at his table ever was known, no stint even in this dark hour of high and impossible living. It was not with him "least be those feasts with simple plenty crowned." He was not guilty of anything simple at table, but rich and rare, and all as it should be.

Of late, however, the meals were most decidedly simple. The fastidious husband waited patiently for some show of improvement; but after a few days, with no signs apparent, he broke loose.

"Mildred, I can stand this no longer!"

"Stand what?" asked Mildred, innocently.

"Why, these meals to be sure, what else?"

"What's the matter with them?"

"Matter with them? Everything's the matter with them, they consist of next to nothing, and not enough of that. I will not stand it, I tell you! Can't you get Fieda back? What made her leave in the first place?"

"She wanted too much."

"How much, pray? It couldn't be too much for the meals she served."

"She wanted too much, and—"

"Give it to her—give her anything she asks—only get her back."

"But living is so high, just now, and Fieda is very extravagant, and so I thought—"

"You had no business to think, since your thinking is all wrong, without consulting me. What's come over you, Mildred?"

"I was merely trying to help you out, George," meekly.

"Help me out? I don't see the point."

"I was trying to make up the other third of the winter's coal, since the price of my hat—which I didn't get—furnished only two-thirds."

George grew calm and was silent. Finally, "your economy doesn't pay, Mildred."

"Nor does yours, George," said Mildred, quietly.

"Then supposing you go and buy any hat, and at any price, only get Fieda back."

"October is the opal month of the year. It is the month of glory, of ripeness. It is the picture month," Henry Ward Beecher.

"October is nature's funeral month. Nature glories in death more than life. The month of departure is more beautiful than the month of coming—October than May. Every green thing loves to die in bright colors."

LADY HARRIE.

An American Quadrille in Brittany.

At St. Servan, where we stayed in Brittany, we met many charming people, both French and English—and two or three Americans. I made friends with a Parisian girl, of about my own age, who lived in the house. She knew not a word of English, but we got along very well. Through her I was introduced into the little coterie, at first mostly composed of French people, who made merry every evening. First, for the benefit of the elders, there would be music, then, for the younger people, dancing. Perhaps I did not learn all the French I might have in that month, but I learned 12 new dances and innumerable curious customs. One of these dances I must speak of, for it was highly entertaining. It began more or less like a quadrille. After a great deal of dancing and singing, the evolutions became gradually less and less dignified, and at last, all hands were joined and the entire party tore through the house like a pack of wild Indians. When I sank breathless into a chair after my first experience with this peculiar form of exercise, a charming English lady asked me in slightly disparaging accents:

"Was that American quadrille your suggestion, my dear?" "The Travel Magazine."

CHINESE GIRLS AT WELLESLEY COLLEGE.

Two Chinese girls who are related to the royal family of their native land, are students at the expense of the Chinese government, at Wellesley college and expect to be graduated with honors at the end of their four year course.

They are the Misses Ping Hsiu Hsi and Chih-Chie Wang, the first named being only 15 years of age, while Miss Wang is but a few years older and, having had a preliminary education in this country, speaks English fluently.

They are extremely interesting girls, from many standpoints, and have made friends everywhere, both in their chosen college and in society. They have elected to wear American garb while here, but their quaint costumes are worn on special occasions, when they attract great attention in their flowing robes.

Ask your grocer to send you Royal Bread. It is made in a clean bakery and the crown label is on every loaf.
