Russia and Japan, if one is to judge by existing signs, are going to fight for its possession. It will be a bitter struggle. Russia it must be remembered, will never feel safe with the Jap in possession of Korea simply because that would bring the oriental to the Yalu river, which lies strategically between Port Arthur and Vladivostok. If, on the other hand Russian soldiers once occupied Korea the officers of Japan would be able from their own shores to sight with their glasses the advance hosts of a rival power. So it will be a fight to the finish before either shall yield in this Korean problem

Japan has always banked on her navy, and a wonderful young navy it is. There is but one word for Japan's collection of fighting ships, and that word is "miraculous." Thirty-one years ago the navy of this little nation consisted of two old steamships, one an antique and wornout American battleship, and the other an ordinary, small, renovated tramp steamer. Today, in power, in rate of speed and in the skill with which they are handled, the ships of Japan are second to none in the world. Even in number the Japanese navy stands eighth on the list of navies of the world. Every month, too, new ships are being added as fast as they can be built, and at the end of next year it is estimated that the Japanese pavy will stand fourth among the great fighting fleets
