SOUTH TEMPLE STRET, affair. What on earth should he do? It was 3 o'clock, and in an hour the wierd gray of dawn would tinge the neighborhood. He smote his head as only a Senator can do it, with a view to shake up the contents in the hope that something tangible would come to the top. But the only effect was to make him more fully realize the damning grotesqueness of his peril. He tried to forget that he was a Senator, to forget that he was a Senator, to forget that he had wakened start-ling echoes in the halls of the national council. He would have given all his wealth, and the balance of his life, if he had never been a public man at all. Would to heaven he had stuck to his native form. He would now he is the 100,000

POUNDS OF WOOL

Drawing his toga still closer about him and assuming the heavy tread of a Senator about to walk over twelve dozen eggs, he proceeded through the darkness, pausing every other step to listen, and hugging up close to the fences at every sound. He got around to the back street after passing through a series street after passing through a series of imaginative difficulties which caused his hair to stand sensitively on end and turned his spinal col-umn into an unbroken current of cold air. The fence was a high one, and there was nothing to stand up on, but he managed by desperately jumping upward to actually catch hold of the top, and then he worked with all his might to bring his body to the same altitude. It was a heavy bedy—a broad, well-rounded, senatorial body. It rubbed up and down the boards, or vibrated across them in a series of contortions, while his eyes, both single to the public good, grew restless in their sockets, and his feet whipped about with such velocity as to shed a pair of red morocco slippers in almost no time at all. But he worked foithfully and he saw opportunities over the past, wading unhesitating-ly through the mold of hoary cen-turies, but he could not find any-thing to parallel this atrocious affair. What on earth should he do?

mest unparliamentary language he could think of, it suddenly struck him that his yard ran back to the next street. If he could get around faithfully, and he saw opportunities to say something, but he couldn't do it, and at last he got his breast upon the top, and there he balanced unevenly for one bright instant, and then he want open the top. and then he went over on the other side, going down with an ease and rapidity which fully compensated for all the trouble and labor of coming up the other side. He reached the grass plot on his back, and with a heartiness that left no doubt of his sincerity. At the end of fifteen minutes he regained his conscients minutes he regained his conscious-ness, and, ultimately, his feet, and as he moved wearily away on them to the house, he hoarsely whisper-"By the gods! can it be possible in a man of wealth and influ-

He tried the basement door, and the first floor door, and the base-ment window, but none of them showed the faintest weakness. He was irretrievably locked and barred out, both he and his toga. The stoop to the first floor was high and open at the side toward the basement door which it closely adjoined. The senator—a man of the people, and the owner of thirteen pairs of pants with hardly a break in any of them, crawled under this stoop, and sat huddled up on his
coming of one of the servants, and

At the end of an hourand a half he basement door was epened, and the cook came out and hurried across the yard. At the same instant the United State Senator in a toga jumped into the area, shot through the door and up the back stairs with all the grace and agility of a scared rooster. He was eating his breakfast whe

In answer to his knock the Senator thrust his head from an upper window, and learned the particulars. He then aroused his wife, and with his help she was speedly dressed.

He then aroused his wife, and with his help she was speedly dressed, and ready to start. The Benator accompanied her to the door, in what might have been a toga, but was really a night-shirt. He even stepped out on the stoop with her (it was lather dark), and stood there until he heard her pass out of the gate. Then he cast a look up at the heavens to see if it was going to rain, and was about framing his mind into the belief that it was, when a sudden jar and slam right behind him sent his heart into his throa, and nearly threw him from OUR INCREASING TRADE
