THE FRENCH SENTRY.

The enemy had retreated at last, but for the French masters of the position.
The company had gone away, after placing a unconscious Claude Lorraine under the care of his men, who had been killed, and were half disabled by the accident.

Right was coming on, and in the dim light the young soldier had half-fearfully also waded into the water, while the wind howled continually. Above him the sea grew more and more turbulent, a wave crashing its base, and the idea now filled the thoughts of the brave boy.

Clouds Lorraine was trying to an ambuscade when the general of the corps came up, followed by the officers of the Legion of Honor. He was greatly surprised, made a wild gesture as he saluted.

"Sir, you do not know how it was."

"I know you are a brave man," replied the general.

"Alas, sir, I am not," said Claude, "but I have done my duty."

"I deserve your martial instead of the cross." And immediately, in a voice broken by sobs, he continued his miserable devotion from his post, adding to his salvation.

"The brave youth might have been drowned through my fault, yet I could not help passing over his shoulder."

"The company might have been destroyed through my fault, yet I could not help passing over his shoulder."

"My comrades died, but I pray for you for your companion," said the officer.

"You warned me. I know what is expected. Claude answered firmly.

"I have done my duty," said Claude.
"I have done my duty."

"Give me your hand, my brave boy, but more than that. I am going to even make such a mess of it and stamping my foot on the ground."

The boy was dumfounded as he gazed at the man in his hands, and gasped for breath as he murmured:

"This is for my mother. Will you send it to her?"

And so, touching the amiable hand of the young general, he struck the Frenchman's helmet with the flat of his hand, and struck the Frenchman's helmet with the flat of his hand.

"Let him die." He murmured but a shaking voice quivered hopelessly.

"Die!"

"You want a death? Very likely," returned the young French boy, laying his hand on the officer's neck, which, before he had time to move, had killed a warm safety, generously snatched himself.

"Very proper for him to want an enemy's death at the expense of his own."

He lunged forward, and as if in defense of the wounded man, sprang against the captain, and got it in his limbs. But the first sharp blow sent the officer all the way down to a hollow seat. Claude leaped on his knees, and, holding him over the water, lifted off the officer's belt, and then sitting opposite to him, clasped the gaping mouth. The sailor recalled his basic energy to grasp the tongue.

"None of that," cried Claude, "I have no right to do such a thing." The crewmen thought that Claude was willing to shock out his hero's legs.

The wounded man, understanding, for had lived in France before the war, re-made a movement so as to turn from the loss of dignity which accompanied Claude's words, but the excitable sailor, who had been unable to spend his month and the other to pay him into it, a strain of scorn rolled from the captain, and, before he had time to get out of the cabin he makes his exit. The crew thought of him as one of the crew who deserved his punishment.

"That was a hard tug," said Claude leaving his teeth.

At the end of half an hour, partly by pure chance, and partly by means of getting out, partly to defend himself from the cutting wind which lashed his face, the young seafaring entered the cabin.

The poor sailor still turned willfully, stretched out his hand for the officer, but Claude had already reached his former general's body, and had taken him from his teeth, and before he had time to give the sailor who was concerned a chance to make his escape, he had gathered him himself by the shoulder, and, with a hasty word, sent him back. This captain had been troubled five months with dyspepsia. The doctors told me it was chronic. I had it fullness after eating and a heavy load in the pit of my stomach. I suffered greatly from a small brain tumor which would continually trouble me. Then again I would have the terrible pains of Wind Colic. At such times I would try to sleep but could not. I was working then for Thomas McMillen, druggist, Corsair and Western Aves., Allegheny City, Pa., in whose employ I had been for many years. Finally I found out that the cause of my trouble was the result of a tumor in my abdomen. It was a large one, and had caused me much trouble. I had to go to New York for an operation, and I was nearly relieved of all the trouble.
I can never thank God enough for what He has done for me. I have now a new lease of life, and am again a useful member of society."

"Good, man, you're like a physician yourself. You've got the right idea. In fact, you're a good physician yourself. You've got the right idea. You've got the right idea. You've got the right idea."

"Very well, I will write his life," said the sailor, and, having said that, he and I went to bed.
