

Gold Hunting in Africa.

A Personal Experience—With Observations on the Character and Customs of the Dusky Combatants in the Present Revolution, and on the Country in General.

Written for the Evening News.

The spirit of adventure is a trait that through the ages we have found in every race, and the initial move in the struggle that was found in some between the British South African company and King Zulu.

This narrative outbreak has been long known, but through their reports to the outside world have been such as to lead people to think they were on terms of the closest friendship with the Malakasi, and that nothing could arise to rupture these feelings.

The fact is, however, that the Malakasi do not consider that the British South African company is a friend, but a foe, and that the Malakasi to the westward was a virgin country, rich in both gold and silver, these strained relations have come about and war between the white and the savages has been brewing for twenty years past.

The British South African company's expedition to opening up Malakasi has been tremendous and the results of it, this country is now populated with the white and the black, and the white and the black are now on terms of the closest friendship with the Malakasi, and the white and the black are now on terms of the closest friendship with the Malakasi.

Over in Malakasi, however, the pick of the gold digger has never been the ground for the reason that the Malakasi allowed no white man to proceed in his territory, the punishment for the transgression of this law being death. The British South African Co. have tried many ways to get a concession from the Malakasi king to work this country, but all efforts in this direction have proved futile. Finally, however, both rich and costly, have been made this savage monarch in order to get him to yield permission for the white to enter, but to all appeals he has remained firm and refused to listen to any petition that had for the object the opening of Malakasi.

Now that the company has it possible to get anything from him by courtesy or persuasion, they are going to do what has been done over and over again in Africa—make war on the savages, and by their superior strength and mode of fighting force them to yield.

The concession which was obtained from the king in 1892 by the Chartered company specified the route to be taken between the Limpopo and Zambesi rivers, having for its eastern terminus Maribou land and the eastern Portuguese possessions, and for its western Malakasi. This territory was and is known as Malakasi, and at the time of occupation it was wisely arranged as a country only waiting for the prospector and Minerals, do not take them into account. As soon as the position on the border of the Malakasi is reached, the prospector is met by a very hostile and dangerous opposition.
