The Latter-Day Saints and Their Achievements.

SALT LAKE CITY, August 13, 1873.

* * * * *

We reached the Townsend House late in the evening, and waited for the morning to reveal Salt Lake City, which is the end of our pilgrimage. It was a charming sight when the sun came over the Eastern mountains, and all the more beautiful for the hundred miles or more of arid plains and hills, through which we had passed the day before. Here are ranges ten thousand feet or more above the sea level, with the snow drifts always in sight and the broad valley between. The city is quite near the mountains, and some twelve miles from the Lake at its nearest point. It rises up out of the plain a beautiful city of gardens and orchards, and tasteful homes, with a few business streets. The city is laid out with broad regular streets, each block containing ten acres and nine blocks making a ward. Water taken from the canyons in the mountains is brought into the gutters of every street, and thence is distributed into every garden and house lot. There are water commissioners for every ward, whose business it is to see that every lot holder has his share of the water. The most exact system is followed in irrigation, and every one is informed of the day and the hour when he can raise the little gate that turns his portion of the city water into his garden. The water is applied about once a week during the growing season. We have here a better illustration of the value of irrigation than in any other spot in this country, for it has been used over twenty years. When the pioneers first came here the spot produced nothing but wild sage, and such plants as grow only in an alkaline soil. Now it is a city of gardens filled with fruit and ornamental trees. Each side of every street is formally planted with shade-trees, which with occasional exceptions are in a flourishing condition. The varieties of trees in most common use are the narrow leaved cottonwood, the yellow locust, the honey locust, the ailanthus, and the mulberry. These all do well, with the exception of the cottonwood, which is smitten with a borer, which will probably exterminate it. In the gardens, which are generally larger than in the country villages of the east, nearly all the plants and vegetables grown in the Northern States do well so far as they have been tested.

As an illustration of the capacities of this soil and climate under skilful treatment, we may mention a few of the things we saw to-day in the grounds of William Jennings, one of the successful business men of the place. The whole party called in carriages by invitation. In front of the house is a fountain with a jet surrounded by a lawn so soft and velvety, that we wondered it was possible to produce it under these brilliant skies. It was the work of six years, and was without spot or blemish, a perfect gem of turf. The grounds were laid out with admirable taste, and ornamented with flowers and shrubs.

Passing from the lawn to the left we entered the fruit yard and vegetable garden. Here were all grown apple trees, pears, peaches and apricots loaded with fruit. The apricots flourish remarkably well, and surpass anything we ever saw in the east. The small fruits were all represented, and the gooseberries and raspberries were of exceptional size and excellence. To the right of the lawn we passed into the vineyard, where the grapes looked flourishing, though they had been put back by a late frost. A native black currant was full of fine fruit, and the flavor was equal to anything of the kind among the foreign varieties. In the vgetable garden we found almost everything we are accustomed to grow at home. And these grounds are remarkable only for the taste and extra labor bestowed upon them. In many others that we passed we saw the same kinds of fruit in equal perfection. It is a grand work to have produced all this floral wealth and beauty over hundreds of acres that were once barren and apparently hopeless.

We have noticed both in the streets and in the gardens occasional trees, whose leaves were turning a yellowish tinge and the fruit dropped prematurely. This is attributed by the people to excess of alkali still in the soil. It does not indicate a diseased state of the tree, for the next season very likely the leaves will put on their usual appearance, and a full crop be realized.

All witnesses here agree in attributing the amelioration of the climate to the continued irrigation and cultivation of the soil. When the country was first settled, there was hardly any rainfall in the summer, now showers are frequent. Formerly there were frosts in almost every month in the year, and it was impossible to raise Indian corn. Now it can be done and much less water is needed for irrigation than in the early days. As one result of the increased rainfall and cultivation, Salt Lake has been raised twelve feet above its old high water mark, and is still gradually rising. These are cheering facts for those who dwell on the plains east of the Rocky Mountains, and for that desolate region which lies between Laramie Plains and the head waters of the Weber River. Not a rod of it is more hopeless than the site of this city twenty years ago. And the results of irrigation outside of the city limits are quite as satisfactory as they are here.

We visited the city markets early this morning, and there found the truck peddlers from the suburbs supplying their customers with about the same variety as in our eastern rural villages. Fine watermelons, potatoes, turnips, onions, carrots, beans, etc., were exposed for sale. Utah now raises its own breadstuffs, and is beginning to send wheat to the east to the great disgust of Colorado. The average product per acre is said to be about thirty bushels. Grass grows rankly on irrigated lands, and two or three tons to the acre are often realized.
