government had chosen to dis. turb the educational peace because the existing system of education was cha-otic, ineffectual and behind the age, making Great Britain the laughing stock of other nations; and it was bound, the premier said, to provide secondary public education and to co-ordinate all the branches of public edu-cation under the control of the borighs and county councils. If in doing this the government has given a tonic to the Liberal party, Mr. Balfour did ot begrudge it Continuing, the premier asserted that a majority of the people believed in re-igiously-taught schols, but it did not agree as to what religion, and that the only alternative was a system permitting denominational teaching in schools wholly supported by rates, as well as promoting it in those schools which were not wholly supported. He said that the claim that representation did not follow taxation was erroneous, since the real control of the schools was vested not in the church authorities, but in the municipal councils and their constituents.

The threats of the non-conformists to refuse to pay the rates, to premier said, were unworthy the cluzens of a free country. Civilized government was impossible if dissatisfied cluzens refused to obey the laws. The non-conformists, the premier declared, should hall the bill with pleasure, for it was an effort to give the people unlimited control of education and their objections to it were in reality political, their object being to turn out the Conservative government. If the govern-ment was defeated in this measure there would be no hope of educational eform, as the agitators did not desire

Mr. Balfour said he did not consider he consequence on political grounds, because the stake was the education of generation of children. If this reform is not unhesitatingly carried through, concluded the premier, the government would earn and deserve the contempt of parents and of children yet unborn. The meeting passed a resolution
