THE GASOLINE WEED BURNER

How to rid the right of way of weeds and brush and the most efficient way to do so with operation of traffic, has been solved by the invention of a machine that does the work of 50 men a day. The new gasoline weed burner covers 25 miles in 12 hours, while heretofore it has required a gang of 25 men, working a full day, to cut the weeds from a single mile of track.

The weed burner is built entirely of steel with regulation trucks. At one end is a gasoline engine, used for propelling the car and pumping the air which forces the gasoline to the burner spreading the oil over the ground. When at work the weed burner runs three or four miles an hour, but can make a speed of from 12 to 15 miles, and is loaded on the road under regular train orders.

Tanks carried on the car platform contain enough gasoline for a day's run. Through rows of burners spreading well beyond the rails the flaming gasoline is forced forward into the weeds, killing root and branch, while the old process did not stop future growth.

It is not uncommon on western branch.
