

Rear Admiral Charles Stillman Sperry the Choice of the Administration For Chief of the Globe Circling Battleship Fleet.

ley D. Evans the administration finally has decided upon Rear Admiral Charles Stillman Sperry instead of Richard Wainwright, as was rumored when it was determined to con-tinue the cruise of the fleet after the retirement of Admiral Evans by reason of age. In selecting Admiral Sperry rather than Captain Wainwright, who, by the way, becomes a rear admiral during the ensuing summer, the government promotes an officer who has made his reputation in peace instead of in war. "Fighting Bob" Evans and Captain Wainwright both belong to the dashing warrior Admiral Sperry has lacked an opportunity to distinguish himself in battle and thus make his name a household word, but his work both afloat and ashore in the naval service has been of such a high measure of excellence as to win him an enduring fame in the navy department. The rear admiral is the youngest of the four officers of that rank now commanding squadrons in the great fleet. He reached his present rank two years ago, considerably earlier than the average officer, one reason for this being that Sperry was ap-pointed to the Naval academy at an unusually early age. He was grad-uated in the class of 1866, being less than nineteen years old and almost at the head of the class. Most of Sper ry's classmates, being older, are retired for age already. Sperry began his career of hard work, without frills, as soon as he left the academy, and he has kept it up ever since. An officer who has known him for forty-five years thus describes his earliest experience in the service:
